A Bombay paper states, on the authority of a letter from Mocha, that " from the vaccine matter having lately failed in Egypt in a great many instances, medical gentlemen were led to institute certain experiments, by which it has been discovered that by inoculating a cow with small-pox matter from the human body fine active vaccine virus is produced. At the time the letter was written there was a Greck child at Mocha that had been successfully vaccinated with matter direct from the cow, produced as above-mentioned, and the virus taken from its pustules had acted with the best effect on several other children at Sucz, where former attempts had failed.

THE FICUS INDICA.

On the banks of the Nerbudda, in the province of Guzzerat, is a banian tree, supposed by some persons to be the one described by Nearchus, and certainly not inferior to it. It is distinguished by the name of Cubbeer Burr, which was given to it in honour of a famous saint. High floods have, at various times, swept away a considerable part of this extraordinary tree; but what still remains is nearly 2,000 feet in circumference, measured round the principal stems; the overhanging branches, not yet struck down, cover a much larger space; and under it grow a number of custard-apple and other fruit trees. The large trunks of this single tree amount to three hundred and fifty, and the smaller ones exceed three thousand: each of these is constantly sending forth branches and hanging roots, to form other trunks, and become the parents of a future progeny. The Cubbeer Burr is famed throughout Hindostan, not only on account of its great extent, but also of its surpassing beauty. The Indian armies generally encamp around it; and, at stated seasons, solemn jatarras, or Hindoo festivals, to which thousands of votaries repair from every part of the Mogul empire, are there celebrated. It is said that 7,000 persons find ample room to repose under its shade. It has long been the custom of the British residents in India, on their hunting and shooting parties, to form extensive encampments, and spend weeks together under this magnificent pavilion, which affords a shelter to all travellers, particularly to all the religious tribes of the Hindoos. It is generally filled with a variety of birds, snakes, and monkeys, the latter of whom both divert the spectator by their antic tricks, and interest him by the parental affection they display to their young offspring, in teaching them to select their food, to exert themselves in jumping from bough to bough, and in taking, as they acquire strength, still more extensive leaps from tree to tree. In these efforts they encourage them by caresses, when timorous, and menace, and even beat them, when refractory.

STORFT DESPATCHES.

During the Sung dynasty, about A.D. 1000, military men in China used to make a hall of wax and enclose in it their secret despatches; to this sort of letter they gave the name of Lã shoo, "wax memorial." We do not remember to have read any where else of such a method of sending secret documents, which at the same time were water-proof.—Malacea Obsever.

PERIODICAL LITURATURE OF AUSTRALASIA.

In New South Wales there are four newspapers. The oldest is the Sydney Gazette, which is the government official paper, and the only one published daily; it was established in 1803, and is conducted by Mr. Howe, a native of the colony, a person of considerable tact. Itis father was well known in the colony as an able man. The next is the Australian, which commenced in 1825. This paper is conducted by Dr. Robert Wardell, a British barrister, educated at an English university, where he took the degree of LL.D. It is said that Mr. Wentworth, a barrister in the colony, also writes in it. The Monitor was set on foot in 1825; its editor is Mr. Ed. ward Smith Hall. Both these last na. pers are opposed to government politics, and their language is extremely free. The profits of the two first papers are said to be £800 a-year. The Gleaner was establish. ed in 1827. The papers of Van Diemen's Land are three in number; the Colonial Times, established in 1816, and conducted by Mr. Bent; the Hobart Town Gazette, commenced in 1825; and the Tosmanian, in 1827.

A quarterly periodical work is announced; it was to commence in Nocember last, and to be entitled "The Australian 'Magazine; or, Quarterly Journal of Theology, Literature, and Science;" edited by the Rev. Charles Pleydell Neale Wilton, fellow of the Cambridge Philosophical Society, late scholar of St. John's College, Cambridge, and one of his Majesty's chaplains in the colony. Its price is to be 5s.

College Examination.

COLLEGE OF FORT ST. GEORGE.

The Hon, the Governor in Council is pleased to publish, for general information, the following extract hom the report of the Board for the College of Fort St. George and for Public Instruction, on the last general examination held there.

"Mr. Anderson, the gentleman who stands first in the Telugu class, translated a difficult Telugu paper into English with great success. His translation from English into Telugu is also a most creditable performance. It gives the full meaning of the original; and the few errors which it contains are principally orthographical. He read and explauned correctly a considerable portion of an official urzec; and he speaks the language with case and with a just pronunciation.

"In Sanscrit, also, Mr. Anderson's performances were highly satisfactory. His translation of a difficult exercise, with one or two exceptions, was perfectly correct.

"In order that Mr. Anderson's merits may be fully appreciated, it is proper to notice that he had not been quite a twelvemonth attached to the college at the period of the examination on which we are now reporting.

" In our two last reports to government we remarked on the great proficiency attained by Mr. Thomas in Tamil. At the present examination an exercise in that language was given him of a construction of more than ordinary difficulty, and such as could be translated well only by one whose acquirements in that language were of a superior order. Thomas's manner of rendering it into English proved that its difficulties were not beyond what he was master of, and his translation is in consequence a highly creditable performance. There is not in it a single material error, nor one which affects the general meaning of the Tamil, although it is not without one or two slight omissions. His translation into the language is throughout such as a native, unacquainted with English, could comprehend. The idiom, in some parts, approaches too much to that of the English, but in others the rendering is extremely good. In the oral part of the examination, Mr. Thomas fully realized the expectations raised of his proficiency from the manner in which he had passed his former examinations; he spoke fluently and read business papers with great readiness.

" Mr. Thomas's success in Tclugu was also very creditable. He translated the same paper that was given to Mr. Anderson, though in some passages he did not quite understand the meaning of the original. His translation into Telugu was a very fair performance ; he read and explained a portion of the same urzee that was given to Mr. Anderson, and he speaks the language with considerable fluency.

" Mr. Cathcart, as stated in our last general report, entered college on the 23d of last September, and, for the penod which he has been attached to the institution, his attainments in the Tamil and Hindoostanee languages are of a superior degree. In Tamil, he undertook the translation of the same paper as that given to Mr. Thomas, though not with equal success. His knowledge of the words was in general tolerably correct, but he was unable to conquer the difficulties of style, in which consisted the great ment of translating the paper well. His translation from English exhibits considetable improvement since he was last examined, both as regards his acquaintance with words and with the idiom of He spoke with confidence and tolerable correctness on several subects, and acquitted himself creditably in reading a Cutcherry paper.

" In Hindoostanee a rather difficult paper was given to Mr. Catheart for translation into English. His version of this, as well as his Hindoostance exercise, contained several errors; but most of them were of little importance, and the general sense of the originals was very correctly expressed. He read and explained a short story readily and accurately. In conversing, he understood all that was addressed to him, and replied correctly and with little hesitation.

" Mr. Arbuthnot's translation of a Tamil paper of a good deal less difficulty than that given to Mr. Thomas and Mr. Catheart was well performed. His exercise into Tamil, the English paper having also been more easy than that translated by the two preceding gentlemen, shows that his stock of words is considerable. He speaks the language with a good deal of case and clearness, and with a good pronunciation. With a little assistance he translated a Cutcherry paper.

" Mr. Arbuthnot is second to Mr. Cathcart on the list of Hindoostanee students. He selected for translation into English an easier paper than that which was taken by the latter gentleman, and, with the exception of three short passages, his version is perfectly correct; but his translation into Hindoostanee was not quite so well executed. He read a story off-hand with facility, and, excepting three or four words, explained it accurately. He speaks the language with propriety, and he understood all that was addressed to him.

" Mr. Stokes stands fourth on the list of Tamil students, and he is but little inferior to Mr. Arbuthnot in his transla-tion from Tamil; but his knowledge of words is not so extensive. Both in this exercise and in his translation from English he evinced a very creditable apprehension of the construction of Tamil sentences, and, considering the short period of his study, his merit is not inferior to that of any of the gentlemen of the Tamil class. In speaking and in reading a Cutcherry paper he was not less successful than in the written part of his exami-

" Mr. Stokes only commenced the study of the Carnataca, his second language, about two months ago, and the progress that he has made is quite satisfactory. An easy paper was delivered to him for translation into English, and he gave the meaning of it with perfect cor-

" Mr. Prendergast, in his Hindoostanee examination, first translated an easy paper; but, at his own request, one of more difficulty was afterwards given him. His translations evince a degree of proficiency very creditable to him, considering the short period that he has been attached to the college, and, with the exception of two or three passages, the general meaning is correctly given. did not attempt to translate into Hindoostance. In conversation he understood much of what was addressed to him.

" It affords us much pleasure to state, that we consider Mr. Anderson and Mr. Thomas to be eminently qualified to transact public business, and to have satisfactorily established their claim to the ho-norary reward of Rupees 3,500 on leaving the college, which we accordingly beg to recommend may be granted to each of them.

" We have also great pleasure in recommending that the highest rate of college allowances may be granted to Mr. Cathcart; and, as we think him competent to transact business in two languages, we would further propose that he be now allowed to enter on the active duties of the public service."

"Fort St. George, 24th July 1827." Published by order of the Hon, the Governor in Council.

E. BANNERMAN, Act. Sec. to Govt.

ASIATIC INTELLIGENCE.

Calcutta.

GOVERNMENT GENERAL ORDER.

VETERINARY SURGEONS.

Fort-William, April 12, 1827.-The Hon, the Court of Directors having, as communicated in paragraphs 51 to 53 of their general letter in the Military Department, under date the 6th Sept. 1826, resolved to procure the services of regularly educated veterinary surgeons for the mounted corps at this presidency; the Right Hon, the Vice-President in council, adverting to the change which this arrangement unavoidably introduces into the prospects of the present sub-assistant veterinary surgeons, has been pleased to determine, that this class of servants shall have the option of taking their discharge, or of entering the subordinate branch of the medical staff, either immediately or on their being eventually displaced from regiments by the appointment of veterinary Sub-assistant veterinary surgeons, who embrace the offer of entering the subordinate medical establishment, will be enrolled on the list in the place they would have occupied had they from the first been attached to the department.

THE LATE DUKE OF YORK.

Head-Quarters, Calcutta, May 11, 1627. _It is with feelings of the deepest sorrow that Lord Combermere announces to his Majesty's army the death of its illustrious commander-in-chief, his Royal Highness the Duke of York.

The heart of every officer and soldier of the British army will tell him, in language that cannot be expressed, how much his profession has lost of military virtue, of character, of consequence and support, by the departure of this distinguished The brave will mourn their patron and leader-military order and high discipline must now look to the benefits conferred on the army by their firm establishment, and in the exercise, preserve them; for the distinguished chief, who connected and cemented both with our national bravery, is no more. A name, however, so imperishable in the army, will never die. The British soldier will never forget the Duke of York. That cherished name will always be the rallying sound for every thing that is exemplary in discipline, and glorious in war.

The officers of the army will go into mourning, on Sunday the 20th instant, for a period of six weeks.

The mourning to consist of black crape over the ornamental part of the hat and cap, the sword knot, and a band round the left arm. The officers on duty to wear black gorget riband, black crape is to be hung from the pike of the colour staff of the infantry, and from the standard staff of the cavalry,

The mourning to commence with the corps of his Majesty's army at Madras and Bombay as soon as possible after the receipt of this order, and likewise at the upper stations under this presidency.

ABSENCE OF CIVIL SERVANTS.

Fort-William, General Department, May 31, 1827 .- The Right Hon. the Vice. President in council is pleased to direct that the following extract (paragraphs 11 and 12) from a public general letter from the Hon, the Court of Directors, dated the 17th Jan. 1827, be published for the information of the Hon. Company's civil service.

Para, 11. " In our despatch in this department, dated the 21st of May 1823, we desired that in all cases of civil servants absent within the limits of the Company's charter, the absentee, at the expiration of eighteen months, should receive only the allowances of a servant out of employ.

12. "You will distinctly understand, that it is our intention that in every such case the privilege of the absentee to return to his office, as well as his right to any portion of the allowances of it, shall cease and determine at the expiration of the term of eighteen months.

DISMISSAL OF LIEUT. BERNARD.

Head-Quarters, Calcutta, June 5, 1827. The following copy of a letter, received by his Exc. the Commander-in-chief, from the Right Hon, the Secretary at War, is published to his Majesty's army in India, for general information:

War-Office, 22d January 1827 .- " My Lord: Having considered it my duty to bring under the notice of his Majesty the conduct of Lieut. Francis Bernard, of the 38th regt. of Foot, as connected with the proceedings of two general courts-martial, held at Fort-William, Bengal, in Nov. 1825, for the trial of that officer, and in March 1826, for the trial of Capt. R. G Greene, of the 31st regt.,* upon charges preferred against him by the said Lieut. Bernard, a transcript of the charges, opinions, and sentences, and your Lordship's remarks thereupon, are herewith annexed;

* See Asiatic Journal, vol. xxii, pp. 200, 468-

I am to acquaint you that, upon a full consideration of all the circumstances of the case, it appeared to his Majesty that Lieut, Bernard had, in the first place. been guilty of long continued and systematic insubordination during the voyage; when, from the peculiar circumstances of the situation of the detachment on board ship, subordination was more important than in most circumstances on shore, and when he, as second in command, himself an officer of many years' standing, and with several very young officers under him, was more peculiarly bound to have shewn an example of obedience, and to have supported his commanding officer's authority, and had in the next place very much aggravated his offence by converting his own defence into grave and wholly unfounded accusation of his commanding officer; and that by such conduct he, Lieut. Bernard, had shewn himself to be unfit to continue to hold a commission in his Majesty's ser-

"I have therefore to acquaint your Lordship, that his Majesty was pleased to approve and confirm the recommendation annexed by you to the proceedings of the count-martial on Capt. Greene, and to command that he, Lient. Francis Bernard, of the 38th regt., should be removed from his Majesty's service.—I am, &c.

" (Signed) PALMERSTON."

APPOINTMENTS ABOLISHED.

Fort-William, June 15, 1827. — Adverting to the small force now assigned for the duties of Cuttack, as well as to the local circumstances of the province, the Right Hon, the Vice-President in conneil deems it unnecessary to continue to employ there an officer with the rank of brigadier: the appointment therefore of brigadier commanding the troops in Cuttack is to be abolished on the 1st proximo.

By this arrangement the services of an officer in the capacity of brigade-major to the troops in Cutack are also dispensed with, and the appointment is annulled from the same date.

The diminished strength of the detachment now maintained in Assam, renders the aid of a brigade-major for conducting the staff duties of that force unnecessary; the appointment is therefore to be discontinued from the 1st proximo, and the monthly allowance for command, now enjoyed by the senior officer in the province, will cease to be drawn from the same date.

The Right Hon. the Vice-President in council is pleased, in consideration of the number of regular corps stationed at Dehly, and of the extent and importance of the magazine established there, to sanction a brigadier from the 1st proximo, for the command of that garrison.

The garrison staff duties, and the details of the troops, will continue to be conducted by the fort adjutant at Dehly, as heretofore.

APPLICATIONS FOR STAFF APPOINTMENTS.

Head-quarters, Calcutta, July 3, 1827.—With reference to the concluding paragraph of G. O. dated 21st Jan. 1823, the commander-in-chief is pleased to direct, that all applications to his Lordship for appointments on the staff shall be transmitted to the military secretary through the commanding officer of the corps to which the applicant belongs, or through the beads of departments when the applicant happens to be employed in any department of the staff.

The transmitting officer will give his opinion on the qualifications of the officer applying for an appointment; especially stating whether he has received from him that support and assistance which he ought, in his situation in the corps or department, to have afforded.

A statement of service should also accompany all applications of the above nature.

ILL-TREATMENT OF NATIVES.

Fort-William, July 13, 1827 .- The Right Hon, the Commander-in-chief having brought to the notice of government complaints of a most serious nature, preferred against Capt. C. C. Smith, of the 6th extra regt. Native Infantry, by different natives, residing at or near Titalya; and his Excellency having also represented the difficulty of assembling an European general court-martial at that remote station; the Vice-President in council was pleased to direct, at his Excellency's recommendation, that the truth of the complainant's allegations should in the first instance be inquired into on the spot, by a commission composed of a gentleman on the civil service and the officers commanding the troops of Titalya.

2. From the report of the commissioners, which is now before government, it appears, that on one occasion Capt. Smith caused five villagers to be seized by a party of sipahees and brought to his house, from which they were conducted to the military bazar of the station, and were there, by his order and in his presence, tied up and flogged, and afterwards subjected to the ignominious punishment of having one side of the head and one half of the beard publicly shaved.

3. The depositions by which the abovementioned facts have been established were taken by the commissioners, in the presence of Capt. Smith, who, so far from attempting to controvert the complainants' statements, virtually admitted them to be correct, by putting not only to the deponents, but also to the witnesses called by himself, a series of questions explanatory of his reasons for having recourse to so tyrannical and illegal a procedure.

- 4. Under these circumstances, the Right Hon, the Vice-President in council considers further investigation unnecessary.
- 5. The resolution of the Hon, the Court of Directors, announced in their general letter of the 14th of April 1813, "to dismiss from their service every officer who should be proved to have been guilty of cruelty to any native, either by violently or illegally beating, or otherwise maltreating him," was formally notified to the army in the general orders of government, under date the 18th of Sept. 1813: and the tenour of the Hon, Court's instructions at the same time received, and promulgated in the same general orders, renders it the imperative duty of the Vice-President in council to bring to their immediate notice the instance of "cruelty to natives" that has been brought home to Capt. Smith.
- 6. An officer who has ventured to disregard the solenn prohibitory orders of the Court of Directors and supreme government, and who has made the troops of the state the instruments of oppression, is, in the opinion of the Vice-President in council, unfit to be entrusted with any military authority; and his Lordship in council is therefore pleased to direct, that on receipt of this order at Dinapore, Capt. Smith be immediately suspended from the exercise of his professional functions, until the pleasure of the Hon, the Court of Directors shall be made known.
- 7. In conformity with the mode of proceeding adopted by government in the year 1821, to the case of Lieut. Viogone, Capt. Smith is permitted to reside at any station of the army under this presidency, and to draw the pay, half batta, and gratuity of his regimental rank, pending the receipt of the Hon. Court's decision on his case.
- 8. The general officer commanding the Dinapore division will report to the Adjutant-general of the army the station at which Capt. Smith may choose to reside during the period of his suspension.

EXTRAORDINARY CONDUCT OF A BRIGADIER.

Head-Quarters, Calcutta, July 20, 1827.

The commander-in-chief having recentty received the report of certain extraordinary proceedings which have taken place at Meernt, his excellency is actuated by a sense of justice towards the individual chiefly concerned therein, as well as by an anxious desire for the due maintenance of discipline on the one hand, and for the protection of those in subordinate situations, against the partial or oppressive conduct of their superiors, on the other, to make them known to the army, with his lordship's judgment and decision thereon.

It appears that in consequence of the neglect of a young officer, proceeding in command of a treasure escort from Meerut. some irregularity occurred, productive of inconvenience, which required notice; that for this purpose Brigadier Murray, c.a., commanding the station of Meerut, sent for the said officer (Ens. Geils, of the 60th regt. N. 1.), and after putting a few questions to him, by no means calculated to elucidate the whole facts of the case, and resting satisfied with answers equally disingenuous and vague, the brigadier, without any reference to the party who thereby became inculpated in the supposed neglect of duty, prematurely and without just grounds proceeded to pass a severe censure, in station orders, on this officer. Licut. and Adj. Cobbe, of the 60th regt, N. I., in which he was charged with gross neglect of duty, in not having duly paraded, inspected, and made over the treasure escort to Ens. Geils, &c.

Licut, and Adj. Cobbe endeavoured to exculpate himself from the censure he had incurred, but in vain, until by an appeal to the anthority of the Major-general commanding the division he obtained a hearing before a court of inquiry, where he produced the most satisfactory proof that he had performed those very duties according to the established custom of the service, for the neglect of which he had received the recorded censure of the brigadier commanding the station.

Major Gen. Sir Thomas Reynell, K.C.B., commanding the Meet at division, was so thoroughly convinced by Lieut. and Adj. Cobbe's exculpation, that he deemed it an act of justice to that officer, to point this out to Brigadier Minray, recommending that an explanatory order might, in justice to the character and feelings of Lieut. and Adj. Cobbe, be promulgated to the staton

Instead, however, of following up this equitable and judicious suggestion of the Major-general, Brigadier Murray issued a station order, containing little else than quotations from the Major-general's letter on the subject; leaving Lieut, Cobbe's censure unrescinded, while the whole scope of it was calculated to add, insult to mjury, and exhibited the most unprecedented disregard and contempt of the Major-general's authority.

These extraordinary proceedings terminate in an appeal to the authority of the Commander-in-chief on the part of the Brigadier, against the decision of the Major-general commanding the division, wherein, amongst a mass of highly objectionable matter, the Brigadier has, with singular perverseness, designated this and certain antecedent references against himself, which had been brought to the Commander-in-chief's notice, and been deemed of such import as to require his lordship's serious reprehension, as "vexatious appeals against (his) authority."

Lord Combermere, after an attentive perusal of the whole of the papers connected with the foregoing case, is under the necessity of declaring, that had Brigadier Murray confronted Lieut, and Adi. Cobbe with Ens. Geil, as it was his duty to have done, the facts of the case would have been most satisfactorily explained. Ens. Geil's statement would have been reconciled to that of Lieut. Cobbe, and the whole matter would have been adjusted, without the necessity of having recourse to the publicity of an order-book.

As matters now stand, his Excellency is compelled to disapprove the proceedings of the Brigadier, and to direct that Major-Gen. Sir Thomas Reynell will cause the station orders of the 3d and 22d June to he rescinded and expunged from the order-books of the station, and those of regiments quartered at Meernt, and will report to the Adj.-Gen, of the army that this order has been complied with.

Lord Combermere having thus per-formed an act of justice to an individual, is desirous of inculcating in the minds of those in authority, that while it is their bounden duty to see that discipline and good order be strictly maintained, it is no less incumbent on their part to govern those under their command with temper and moderation, and where they may have to use their authority with rigour, that they should ascertain with judgment and due deliberation both sides of the question, ere they proceed to decide; otherwise, they are liable to injure the cause of discipline and subordination, by subjecting their proceedings to imputations repugnant to that character for justice and impartiality which is the basis of their authouty.

PRACTICE OF COURTS-MARTIAL.

Head-Quarters, July 26, 1827.-In consequence of circumstances which have recently occurred, the Commander-inchief desires it may be borne in mind, that the prosecutor before a general court-martial should, in all cases, be a military person. Whenever, therefore, charges pre-ferred on the complaint of any person, who is not an officer in the army, are to be investigated before a military tribunal, the prosecution must be conducted by the Judge Advocate.

The complainant, who will, in that case, become the principal witness, should be allowed to remain in court, after having given his own evidence, during the whole of the investigation, in order that the Judge Advocate may refer to him, but he should not be allowed to cross-examine the witnesses, excepting through the medium of the Judge Advocate.

Asutic Journ. Vol. 25. No. 146.

EXAMINATION OF INTERPRETERS.

Head-Quarters, Calcutta, Aug. 1. 1827.
The Commander-in-chief having perused the proceedings of the several committees, recently assembled for the examination of Interpreters attached to regiments on this establishment, is sorry to find, that the number declared duly qualified falls short of what he had anticipated; but though comparatively few of those subjected to that examination have proved themselves equal to the efficient discharge of the duty of Interpreter, his Excellency, adverting to the terms of the several reports, is happy to find that the attainments of the following officers have been reported such as to qualify them for that situation; such as to qualify them for that situat Lieut J. H. Jarvis, Artillery, Lieut, F. Wheler, 2d Light Cavalry, Lieut, F. Wheler, 2d Light Cavalry, Lieut, T. Skipton, 10th Light Cavalry, Lieut, J. Fisher, 1st regt, N.I. Lieut, W. V. Torckler, 4th regt, N.I. Lieut, W. V. Torckler, 4th regt, N.I. Lieut, W. M. N. Sturt, 10th regt, N.I. Lieut, W. H. M. N. Sturt, 10th regt, N.I. Lieut, W. Hunter, 15th regt, N.I. Lieut, W. Hunter, 15th regt, N.I. Lieut, D. P. Wood, 17th regt, N.I. Lieut, J. Griffin, 24th regt, N.I. Lieut, J. W. Ragrave, 25th regt, N.I. Lieut, I. R. Magrave, 25th regt, N.I. Lieut, J. W. G. W. Sturt, 18th regt, N.I. Lieut, H. R. C. McKenly, 41st regt, N.I. Lieut, H. R. Toomerville, 51st regt, N.I. Lieut, H. R. Toomerville, 51st regt, N.I. Lieut, H. W. Bigueli, 62d regt, N.I. Lieut, G. Garrett, 1st Extar regt, N.I.

The officers above-mentioned having evinced their proficiency in the Oriental languages, are to be exempted from future examination, excepting that which is prescribed by general orders of the 17th Feb. 1823, by the public examiners of the college of Fort-William, whenever they may come to the presidency, and which they will then be expected to undergo.

Lord Combermere, adverting to this being the first occasion which has occurred for carrying into execution the general order relative to the qualifications of regimental Interpreters, and being unwilling to visit with severity those who have failed, is pleased to extend to them a further probationary period until the 1st of next November, when it is hoped that few will be found unequal to the task assigned.

The Commander-in-chief rests confident that the pride and ambition of the officers of this army will rouse them to the full exertion of their talents in acquiring the requisite proficiency to enable them to fill the situation of Interpreter, and that these feelings will, by urging to redoubled application, avert the necessity of removing any of the present incumbents, though it is to be clearly understood, that after next examination, no unqualified Interpreter is to retain his appointment.

Lord Combernere being desirous that any other officers who have made a proficiency in the native languages, and who express a wish to that effect, should be examined, to enable him to judge of their qualifications in that important branch of their duty, and without which they are untit to hold many staff situations, directs it to be notified, that all who express a wish to undergo such trial will be duly examined.

RELIEF OF TROOPS AT MHOW.

Fort William, Aug. 3, 1827 .- With a view of rendering the troops of the division of the Bombay army posted at Mhow, available for the duties of the territory immediately under that presidency, to which the military establishment, as now disposed, is found inadequate, the Right Hon, the Governor General has resolved to re-occupy the station of Mhow with a detachment from Bengal; the troops therefore, of every arm, belonging to Bombay, at present stationed at Mhow, will be relieved at the earliest convenient period after the close of the rainy season by a force from this presidency, consisting of 1 troop of European horse artiflery, 1 company of European foot artillery, 1 regiment of Native Cavalry, 3 regiments of Native Infantry, and a company of pioneers, with establishments and staff for the force and station on a scale which will be communicated to the proper departments, and agreeably to instructions which will be furnished to His Exc. the Commander-in-chief in India.

On the arrival at Mhow of a part of the relieving force equal to a regiment of cavalry and a regiment of infantry, the whole of the Bombay troops will proceed to such stations within the limits of their own presidency as may be indicated by the military authorities at Bombay.

The officer who may be appointed to command at Mhow, or, in his absence, the senior officer with the above-mentioned portion of the relieving force, will, under the orders of the Commander-inchief, arrange with the commanding officer of the relieved troops, for receiving charge of all public buildings, barrack and Euronean hospital furniture, siege ordnance and equipments, and ordnance stores in magazine, also commissariat and Medical stores in depôt, in the condition in which they may be found on regular survey, and under such instructions as may be furnished by the Military and medical boards respectively, and by heads of departments.

No camp equipage, nor doolies, nor any articles of regimental or artillery field equipment, are to be included in this transfer.

His Exc. the Commander-in-chief is requested to make the necessary dispositions for the allotment and march of the troops destined to occupy the station of Mhow, to the command of which an officer will hereafter be nominated by go. vernment.

COURT MARTIAL. LIEUT. COURTAYNE.

Head-Quarters, Calcutta, July 19th, 1827.—At a General Court Martial held at Maulmein, on the 17th May 1827, Licut. D. A. Courtayne, of H. M. 45th Regt., was arraigned on the following charges, viz.

1. "For having purchased a quantity of brandy of Mr. Munyard, at the rate of (24) twenty-four rupees per dozen, and afterwards when it was tendered for delivery at Maulmein, refusing to take it, denying that he had offered more than twenty rupees (20) for the same.

2. "In having swindled the colonel of his regiment out of a round sum, by making him pay about three times as unuch for his house as he had expended in building it, or words to that effect, and that Mr. Munyard had heard that Lieut, Courtayne and other gentlemen had built it on speculation, with that view.

3. "In having, on many occasions, taken things away from vessels without offering payment, saying that he must have them, and frequently having sold these very articles, or others of a similar kind, in a few days afterward."

The whole of the above charges having been declared and circulated by Mr. Munyard, 1st officer of the H. C. steam vessel Enterprize, to be true, and eventually coupled with epithets of the most disgraceful and scandalous nature. Such conduct, or any part thereof, is therefore prejudicial to the honour and character of an officer and gentleman, and to the service.

Upon which charges the court came to the following decision:

Finding and Sentence.—" The Conrt is of opinion that the prisoner, Lieut, Denis Arthur Courtayne, H. M. 45th Regt., is not guilty of the charges alleged against him, and does therefore most fully and honourably acquit him of all and every part thereof."

Remarks,-" The Court cannot close its proceedings without expressing its regret that an officer, who appears to have borne so high a character as an officer and gentleman, should have been forced to resort to a court-martial, for the purpose of vindicating himself from calumnious allegations to the satisfaction of his brother officers, for which there does not exist the slightest grounds; and the Court feel it incumbent to notice, that they were led to admit evidence which might appear irrelevant, but still it was judged most imperious to do so, for the purpose of giving the fullest satisfaction to both prosecutor and prisoner, the former appearing to have been led into error by foul reports reports, not emanating in himself, and the character of the latter might have suffered most materially had not such a course been adopted."

Which decision it appears has been confirmed by Major Gen. Sir Archibald Campbell, G.C.B., commanding the division on the Tenasserim Coast,

The foregoing order is to be entered in the General Order-book, and read at the head of every regiment in his Majesty's service in India.

By Order of the Commander-in-chief, A. MACDONALD, Adjt. Gen. of H. M. Army in India.

CIVIL APPOINTMENTS.

Territorial Department.

Aug. 2. Mr. H. B. Brownlow, assistant to magistrate and to collector of Barelly.

Mr. T. P. Marten, ditto ditto of Ghaseepore.

MILITARY APPOINTMENTS. PROMOTIONS, &c.

Fort William, July 13, 1927.—Lieut. A. H. E. Boileau, of Engineers, to survey lower part of Dooab, from Cawapore to Allahabad, with usual allowance of a surveyor.

allowance of a surveyor.

July 16.—Assist. Surg. G. Temple to perform melical duties of civil station of Howrah until further orders, v. Stewart dec.

July 20.—Infrastry. Maj. C. R. Kennott to be leut. col., from 23d Feb. 1827, v. Garnham dec.

Bent Cot, Iron 230 Feb. 1821, v. Carman Ge. 37th N.I. Capt. C. A. G. Wallington to be major. Lieut. C. Griffiths to be capt. of a comp., and Fin. Edw. Maybery to be Beut. from 23d Feb. 1827, in suc. to Kennett prom.

Assist. Surg. John Row to be surg., from 12th July 1827, v. Crawfurd retired.

Assist, Surg. D. Stewart, app. to medical duties of civil station of Howrah, v. P. Stewart dec.

Head-Quarters, June 30, 1827.—Lieut. Matthle to act as interp. and qu. mast. to 1st Europ. regt., until further orders, in room of Lieut. Howard; dated 25th Nov. 1825.

July 13. Licut. Lyons to act as interp. and qu. mast. to 34th N.L., during absence of Licut. Ley-tester; dated 15th June.

Lieut. Coi. Day (lately prom.) posted to 51st N.i.

Lieut. Coi. Jas. Tod removed from 51st N.I. to 2d Europ. regt.

Surg. Fallowfield app. to 65th N.I., and Assist Surg. J. Leslie to 2d bat. artillery, at Dum-Dum. July 17.—Officiat. Assist. Surg. Logan app. to doduty with the artillery at Dum-Dum; and Officiat. Assist. Surg. McRae with H.M.'s 47th regt. at Berhampore.

Fort William, July 27.—Assist. Surg. H. Cooper to be surgeon, from 12th July 1827, v. Cockedec. Lieut. Jas. Croudace, 11th N.I, to have rank of capt. by brevet, from 16th July 1827.

Assist, Surg. E. W. W. Raieigh to be surgeon to Governor-general, from 21st June, v. Cavell dec. lst-Lieut, T. B. B. Bingley, regt. of Artillery, having quitted india without permission from covernment to that effect) struck off strength of army, from 23d June 1827.

Regt. of Artil. 2d-Lieut. G. Campbell to be 1st-lieut. from 23d June 1827, v. Bingley struck off.

Head-Quarters, July 20.—Assist. Surg. Bryce directed to join and do duty at depôt at Chinsurah. July 23.—Horse Artillery. Capt. C. Graham re-moved from 2d troop 2d brig. to 3d troop 2d brig., Blake removed from latter to former.

Assist, Surg. Buchanan directed to join and do duty with 2d bat. Artiliery.

Lieut. Col. Com. Penny removed from 33d to 3d

N.I., and Lieut. Col. Com. Bowen from 3d to 33d

Lieut. R. A. Master, 7th L.C., to act as alde-de-camp to Maj. Gen. Shuldham; dated 3d July.

Lieut, and Adj. W. Payne to act as interp, and qu. mast. to 30th N.I., during absence of Lieut. McSherry; dated 3d July.

Surg. G. Angus (lately prom.) posted to 27th

Assist. Surg. J. S. Sullivan app. to 16th N.I.

Assist. Surg. F. Furnell app. to Sylhet Light

2d-Lleuts. G. B. Tremenheere and W. H. Gra-ham, of Engineers, directed to join corps of Sap-pers and Miners.

July 24.—Assist. Surg. Rogers directed to place himself under orders of superintend surgeon at Kurnaul.

July 25.—8th L.C. Lleut. R. W. Hogg to be interp. and qu. mast., v. White resigned.

31st N.I. Lieut. A. L. Durie to be adj., v. J. M. Heptinstall prom.

41st N.I. Lleut. W. H. Halford to be adj., v.

58th N.I. Licut. W. G. J. Robe to be interp. and qu. mast., v. Turner dec.

66th N.I. Lieut. W. Souter to be interp. and qu. mast., v. Delamam on furlough.

Licut. and Adj. C.H. Wintour, and Licut. Interp. and Qu. Mast. W. Conway, 53d N.I. allowed to exchange appointments.

Surg. C. Renny app. to 69th N.I.

Assist. Surg. G. G. Brown app. to 66th N.I.

Assist. Surg. Beattle app. to 8th N.I. Lieut. Col. E. Simons removed from 48th to 56th N.I., and Lieut. Col. J. Alexander, from 56th to 48th do.

July 26.—Licut. Reilly, corps of Sappers and Miners, to officiate as garrison engineer at Allyghur, as a temporary arrangement; dated 19th June.

July 30.—Lieut, A. M'Murdo to act as interpand qu. mast. to 33d N.I. during indisposition of Lieut. Riddell; dated 6th July 1827.

July 31.—Assist. Surg. Dollard directed to do duty with detachment of 6th bat. Artillery at Dum-Dum.

Assist, Surg. Barber directed to place himself under superintend, surgeon at Agra.

Assist. Surg. Cameron directed to place himself

Assist. Surg. Cameron uncertain to page among under superintend, surgeon at Campore.

Assist. Surgeons appointed. B. Wilson to 31st N.I.; J. Warrall, to 4th Local Horse; G. Smith to 50th N.I.

Surgeons appointed. C. E. Everest (lately prom.) to 67th N.I.; R. B. Pennington (ditto) to 1st brigade Horse Artil, at Campner; J. Row (ditto) to 5th Extra N.I.; W. Mansell removed from 5th Extra N.I. to 62d N.I.; H. Cooper (lately prom.) to 63d N.I.

Aug. 2.—Ens. W. C. Hollings removed, at his own request, from 53d, and posted to 51st N.I.

Aug. 8.—Lieut. (Brev. Capt.) T. D'Oyley to act as adj. to detachment of 6th bat. artil. at Dum-Dum, v. Dalzell app. aide-de-camp to Gov. Gene-Assist. Surg. B. C. Sully app. to do duty with H.M.'s 59th regt. at Berhampore.

Assist. Surg. W. Montgomerie app. to medical charge of detachment of 6th bat. artillery at Dum-Dum.—Assist. Surg. W. Dollard on being relieved by Mr. Montgomerie, directed to rejoin 5th batartillery.

Assist. Surg. T. Clemishaw app. to do duty with 67th N.I.

Assist. Surg. J. O'Dwyer app. to Rungpore Light Infantry. — Officiating Assist. Surg. A. Thomson, when relieved, directed to proceed to presidency.

Assist, Surg. C. S. Grant app. to 4th Extra N.I. at Allahabad.—Officiating Assist, Surg. E. Oliver, when relieved, directed to proceed to presidency.

Aug. 4.—Bundelcund Prov. Bat. Lleut. James Hay, 40th N.I., to be adj., v. Robe appointed interp. and qu. mast. of 58th N.I.

Aug. 7.—Assist. Surg. T. Drever removed from 53d to 11th N.I., and directed to join at Kurmaul.

Regt. of Attil. Lieut. W. T. Garrett to be adj. and qu. mast. to 2d bat., v. D'Oyley removed to 6th bat.

Cadet Christie app. to do duty with 2d brighorscartil at Dum-Dum.

HIS MAJESTY'S FORCES.

Head-Quarters, July 14.—Lieut. C. F. Holmes, 20th Foot, to be capt. by brevet in East-Indies only.

Licut. Ainslie, 4th L.Dr., to be aide-de-camp to Licut. Gen. Sir T. Bradford, v. Licut. Col. Rainey

Ens. Green to do duty of acting qu. mast. to 38th regt. from 29th June, v. Lleut. Minchin dec. July 21.—Lieut. John Norman, 54th F., to be capt. by brevet in East-Indies only.

FURLOUGH.

To China.—Aug. 3. Ens. J. G. Ellis, 69th N.I., for 18 months, for health (also to Cape of Good Hone).

HIS MAJESTY'S FORCES.

To Burope.—July 14. Lieut. Hart, 13th L.Dr., on private affairs.—19. Lieut. Ogfisie, 13th L.Dr., on private affairs.—Lieut. Eyre, 6th F., on private affairs.—Lieut. Kershaw, 13th L.Inf., for health.—Brev. Col. Macbean, 5tth F., on private affairs.—Lieut. Warren, 54th F., on private affairs.

To Sea.—July 14. Capt. Cockell, for six months, for health.

LAW.

SUPREME COURT.

Registration of the Stamp Regulation .-We intimated last month our intention of giving the remainder of the proceedings on this question: their extreme length, however, forbids us from giving them in full. In our last number we inserted a report of the argument of the leading counsel against the registration entire. The junior counsel on the same side trod nearly the same ground of argument: to insert their speeches would, therefore, be superfluous. As the arguments of the opposing counsel seem to have made no impression on the court, it is scarcely necessary to give the speeches of the Advocate General and Mr. Cleland, in support of the regulation, more especially, as the judgments delivered from the Bench afford a lucid summary of the whole. It is worth while, however, to insert the conclusion of the speech of Mr. Dicken (the junior counsel against the registry) as an example of the success with which "political declamation" was avoided in this discussion.

"I have now done, my Lords, and though I have endeavoured to urge no argument that I did not think a strong one, I am aware that I have been scarcely so brief as I might have intended; but I shall not apologize for the length of time I have occupied your Lordships' attention. The case is too important to require it. myself I may truly say that I felt more than the interest of a mere advocate in this cause, which, without any exaggeration of language, may well be said to be the most important question ever debated in this court-a question in which, and in its results, every inhabitant of Calcutta is most deeply interested. As a British subject, but yet born here, I have felt perhaps even yet more than many of my fellow citizens, because I can more clearly understand the disadvantages to which we are about to be subjected, and much more deeply regret the privileges of which we are all in common deprived. Hitherto, my Lords, we have enjoyed some immunities and some exemptions in comparison with those around us. Those immunities and those privileges, it now seems to be the labour of this Government to destroy, and if they succeed in their present object, they will have it in their power at any time to destroy them, and to expel every Englishman, if they wish it, from the precincts of Calcutta. Deprived of many of our rights by parliamentary authority on a supposed necessity, deprived of others by acts of the local government without any necessity at all, we have not even the means of making known our grievances, where as yet they are not understood. Feeling, as I do, these evils, and believing that they will increase, and that there is no adequate check to abuses here, most sincerely should I rejoice to see the day when larger political privileges should be extended to this country. For we are yet, I am sorry to say, the sport of a Legislation carried on in ignarance of our rights, which are therefore disregarded. But still, my Lords, we look to you, and to this court instituted as safeguards against the government, for our protection in this case. Exercising as you do political powers, you have a right to be governed by considerations of policy. On such considerations you cannot for a moment hesitate. A power of unlimited taxation is claimed where every consideration of policy, of convenience, and justice points out that there ought to be a limit, and a most guarded limit. It is claimed against us by those whose interests are opposed to our own, and against whose power you were placed here as a check. I most earnestly intreat your Lordships to recollect these things, and if, my Lords, you have for a moment allowed them less than their due influence-if any of you have rashly, and I must use the word, given utterance to an extra-judicial opinion, unfavourable to our cause, let me implore you for that very reason to watch over your own words with the greater caution. For though you have given it but as an opinion, others may have accepted it as a pledge; and, even if wholly untrammelled by such embarrassments, allow me to remind you that you the operation of human infirmities and human prejudices, and there is still a danger lest your self-love should lead you to adhere but with too much tenacity to the judgments you had once formed and pronounced.

"Here, my Lords, for upwards of one hundred years has the British dominion been established, and for the same period has British law prevailed. This is not a conquest, but a colony which has risen with us, and grown with our growth, and never since its establishment has it been subjected to such a power as that now claimed, or has such an invasion of the rights of its inhabitants been attempted. And again I intreat you to consider the consequences that may flow from the registry of this act. and the arbitrary powers by which it is to be enforced: no where, my Lords, ought such powers to be more cautiously given, more narrowly watched, more efficiently controlled. The timidity of the natives, their dread of power, and their ignorance of the means of seeking redress, even if effectual redress were not to be sought at the distance of half the globe, will all combine to make the operation of this law here more mischievous, oppressive and injunous than it could be elsewhere, where the people better understand their rights, and nere more bold in maintaining them.'

The judges delivered their judgments this day scriatin; the following are copies of the minutes of their judgments, which are inserted, apparently demi-officially, in the Government Gazette.

Sur C. Grey.- This is a petition, on the part of several inhabitants of Calcutta, against the registering in this Court of a regulation for the levying of Stamp Duties m Calcutta; which regulation having been previously sanctioned by the Court of Directors and Board of Commissioners for the Affairs of India, was passed by the Vice-President in Council, first on the 14th December 1826, and again on the 14th of June 1827, and has been published and tendered for registration in the court. Counsel were heard in support of this petition, on the 3d, 4th, 5th, and 6th of July, 1827. The regulation is founded upon the nincty-eighth, nincty-ninth and hundredth sections of the Act of the 53d Geo. III. 6 155, entitled an Act for continuing in the East-India Company for a further term the possession of the British territories in India, together with certain exclusive privileges; for establishing further regulations for the government of the said territories, and the better administration of justice within the same; and for regulating the trade to, and from the places within the limits of the said Company's charter.

The above-mentioned sections are as follows:—(Here the learned judge read the section referred to, and also the 25th of the same act, prescribing the form of sanction and approbation.) He then continued:

The first question which arises out of these clauses is this: "What was the power which, at the time of passing this Act, in 1813, the Indian Governments had of imposing taxes in any places beyond the limits of Calcutta, Madras, and Bombay?"

The East-India Company, before the year 1765, acting under the authority of several Royal Charters and Acts of Parliament, had acquired portions of territory from the native princes of India. In that year the president and council of Fort William, in Bengal, obtained from the Mogul emperor the office of Dewan of the provinces of Bengal, Behar, and Orissa. It is not necessary to enter into any minute consideration of that grant It cannot now be disputed before any British tribunal, that previous to 1813, by that grant of the emperor, by his subsequent acquiescence, and by the establishment of the existing relations between him and the British Government, the whole sovereign rights and powers over those provinces had been transferred from him. powers had been long exercised by the British Government: no foreign interference with the revenues had been permitted; and by the same act, upon the construction of which the present argument has arisen, the sovereignty of the British crown was then expressly asserted over the whole territory.

But although there can no longer be any question upon this point, it may be said that it is not, perhaps, yet fully determined for whom, in contemplation of English law, the Company at first took the dewanny, and their other territorial acquisitions, whether for the King, for the British people at large, or for themselves. These questions were agitated in England, and certainly do not appear to have been ever formally determined, otherwise than by the express assertion of the sovereignty of the crown which, indeed, was always expressly reserved in the royal charters, and if it had not been so expressed, must still have been implied, wherever sovereign powers were acquired by British subjects.

But in 1767 the Parliament, without making any declaration upon any question of right, provided by 7 Geo. III. c. 157. s. 2. that the territorial acquisitions and revenues latelyobtained, should remain in possession of the Company for a limited time, and the same possession has been continued up to this time, and extended to all new acquisitions made before July 1813, by the following acts:

session

following acts: 9 Geo. III. c. 24, s. 2. 13 Geo. III. c. 64, s. 19. 19 Geo. III. c. 61, s. 1. 20 Geo, III. c. 56, ss. 1, 6. 21 Geo. III. c. 65, ss. 5, 8, 39. 24 Geo. III. c. 25, s. 83. 33 Geo. III. c. 52, s. 1. 53 Geo. III. c. 155, s. 1. At the same time that the possession of the Indian territories and revenues has been thus continued in the United Company, provision has been made for the government thereof by several other acts. Of these the 13 Geo. III, c. 63, s. 7, provides, that the whole civil and military government of the presidency of Fort William in Bengal, and also the ordering, management and government of all the territorial acquisitions and revenues in the kingdoms of Bengal, Behar, and Orissa, are vested in the Governor-general and Council, in like manner as the same were before in the president and council. By the 24 Geo. III. c. 25, s. 1. the King was empowered to appoint six commissioners " for the better government and security of the territorial possessions of this kingdom in the East-Indies," and by the 39th clause of the same act it is provided, that whereas complaints have prevailed that divers rajahs, zemindars, polygars, talookdars, and other native landholders within the British territories in India, have been unjustly deprived of, or compelled to abandon and relinquish, their respective lands, jurisdictions, rights, and privileges, or that the tributes, rents, and services required to be by them paid or performed for their respective possessions to the said United Company, are become grievous and oppressive; and whereas the principles of justice, and the honour of this country, require that such complaints should be forthwith inquired into, and fully investigated, and if founded in truth, effectually redressed : be it therefore enacted, that the Court of Directors of the said United Company shall, and they are hereby accordingly required forthwith to take the said matters into their serious consideration, and to adopt, take, and pursue such methods for enquiring into the causes, foundation, and truth of the said complaints, and for obtaining a full and perfect knowledge of the same, and of allcircumstances relating thereto, as the said Court of Directors shall think best adapted for that purpose; and thereupon, according to the circumstances of the respective cases of the said rajahs, zemindars, polygars, talookdars, and other native landholders, to give orders and instructions to the several governments and presidencies in India, for effectually redressing, in such manner as shall be consistent with justice and the laws and customs of the country,

all injuries and wrongs which the said rajahs, zemindars, polygars, taloodar, and other native laudholders, may have sustained unjustly in the manner aforesaid, and for settling and establishing, upon principles of moderation and justice, according to the laws and constitution of India, the permanent rules by which their respective tributes, rents, and services shall be in future rendered and paid to the said United Company, by the said rajahs, zemindars, polygars, talookdars, and other native landholders.

By the 33 Geo. III. c. 52, s. 9, the Board of Commissioners for the Affairs of India are to superintend, direct, and control all acts and concerns which in any wise relate to or concern the civil or military government or revenues of the territories and acquisitions in the East-Indies, and by the 23d section of the same act, no order of the Directors concerning the government or revenues, after it has received the approbation of the Board of Commissioners, can be varied by the Court of Proprietors: and by s. 24, the whole civil and military government of the presidency of Fort William, and the ordering, management, and government of the territorial acquisitions and revenues, are vested in a Governorgeneral and three counsellors, subject to such regulations as are provided by Act of Parliament.

By the 53 Geo. III. c. 155, s. 1, it is enacted, the territorial acquisitions and revenues shall remain under the government of the Company for a further term, subject to the rules laid down by Act of Parliament.

It was in obedience to the above-mentioned 39th clause of the act of the 24th Geo. III. c. 25, that those arrangements and regulations were made by the government in this part of India, between 1789 and 1793, which are generally known by the name of " the permanent settlement;" the substance of which was that the jumma, or assessment upon land which was then made, was fixed for ever, and that the existing landholders, and their heirs and lawful successors, should be allowed to hold their estates at such assessment for ever. It scarcely can be necessary to say, that this settlement related to the land tribute alone, and did not affect the power of the sovereign, wherever that power might be lodged, to levy taxes on other property. Even if such had been the intention of those who made the regulation, the compact would have been void. No government can, by any agreement or law, prevent future governments from raising, by new laws, such revenues as are necessary for the well-being of the state; but in this instance the settlement was expressly stated to be a settlement of the land assessment only: the sayer duties, though altered, and separated in collection from the land revenue, were not permanently settled; nor was there any declaration that could prevent the imposition of new taxes on other property than land.

One of the grounds on which the settlement was recommended by the authorities at home was: " an assessment below what the country could bear, was no detriment. in the long run, to the government itself, because the riches of the people were the riches of the state." The Fifth Report of the Select Committee of 1812, says that the abolition of tax on spirituous liquors has not been final, or under any such declaration as should preclude the government at any future time from the option of restoring the collections in question, and Lord Cornwallis, in his minute of 3d February 1790, says of the internal duties: "some may he increased, and others diminished or struck off, according as may be judged advisable; and in a course of time, as commerce and wealth increase, such regulations may be made in the duties on the internal trade, and the foreign imports and exports, as will afford a large addition to the income of the public, whenever its necessities may require it, without discomaging trade or manufactures, or imposing any additional rent on the lands."

In 1797 (I believe) a stamp duty was imposed in the interior, which, with various modifications, has been continued to this time, and the produce in 1821-22 of the Bengal stamp duties was more than fifteen lacks of current rupees. If this statement be accurate, it seems to be reasonably evident, that the Indian governments under the control of the Court of Directors and the Board of Commissioners for the Affairs of India, had, in 1813, a general right and power to levy taxes in the British territories in India; restricted only by the permanent settlement of the land assessment in those parts of India in which it had taken place; by some difficulties which were opposed to the exercise of these powers in Calcutta, Madras, and Bombay; and by the common obligation of duty, which ought to prevent every government from requiring any taxes from the subject, except such as are required for the common good of all.

I should not have thought it necessary to enter into this long detail, if the general power to levy taxes in the interior had not been denied by counsel. I am not quite sure that I apprehend rightly the grounds of that denial, but after taking all the pains I could to do so, I suppose them to be, first that as the power had never been expressly and specifically given by act of Parliament, it still remained inherent in Parliament, and that a new tax could only be imposed by a new act; secondly, that the 25th clause of the 53d Geo.III. c. 155, gave, for the first time, the power of imposing duties of export, import, and transit, and that by expressing those only, it excluded all other duties or taxes.

To the first argument, I apprehend it may be answered, that the words "the whole civil and military government," and the ordering of the revenues, are large enough to include the power of taxation, and that this court has no right to narrow their plain meaning; that if the legislature meant to reserve so important and so obvious a branch of government, they would have done it by express words; that "the possession of the revenues" has been given from twenty years to twenty years to the Company, and this would scarcely be consistent with an implied reservation to Parliament of the right of altering them in the interval; that cotemporaneous usage might be resorted to for the explanation of these acts of Parliament, if there was any doubt to be explained, and a frequent variation might be shewn of the taxes in the Indian provinces by authority of the government; and that the supposition of the parliament having either been ignorant of these acts of the Indian government, in altering the revenues, or of its having meant to reserve the power of taxation without expressing it, becomes quite untenable, when we see that, by another series of enactments, the 20th Geo. III. c. 8, s. 5; 33d Geo. III. c. 50, s. 126; 53d Geo. III. c. 155, s. 65; 54th Geo. III, c. 36, s. 55, all the accounts of the revenue, accurately arranged and minutely subdivided, are directed to be laid annually before Parliament. As for the argument upon the 25th clause of the 53d Geo. III. c. 155, it is founded, as it seems to me, in an entirely erroneous view of the subject. That clause, so far from giving, for the first time, a power of levying particular duties, recognizes a previously existing power, by providing that no new duties shall be imposed, except in a particular way, and the whole and sole object of the clause seems to have been, to prevent any vexatious or capricious interference with the trade, which by the same act was, for the first time, opened between the whole United Kingdom and India.

H.

The next position which was maintained was, that, even if a general power of taxing the provinces be admitted, still the words in the 98th sec. of 53d Geo. III., c. 155, viz. "in as full, large, and ample a manner, &c." have relation only to the manner of taxing, and not to the nature of the tax to be imposed, and that we, may restrict the meaning of the words, "duties of customs and other taxes," so that they shall include only other taxes of the same kind, or (by the reference which is made to the 25th section) only duties of caport, import, and transit.

Some

Some authorities were cited for the purpose of establishing rules for the construction of dubious acts of Parliament, all of which appear to me to be entirely inapplicable to this case, in which no doubt can be fairly raised as to the meaning of the words. The preamble of the 98th clause declares it to be expedient to raise " duties and taxes" in Calcutta, without stating any limitation as to the sort of duty or tax; the enacting part of the same clause does not only use the terms "duties of customs and other taxes," but adds, "in respect of all goods, wares, merchandizes, commodities, and property whatsoever;" and to put the matter beyond all doubt, goes on to say, "in as full, large, and ample manner as the government may now lawfully impose any duties or taxes on any person whomsoever, or in any place whatsoever."

The reference made at the close of the 98th section to the 25th section has for its object to point out the mode of obtaining the sanction of the authorities at home, and not to explain the nature of the tax; and I really do not understand the argument by which it has been attempted to shew, that "duties of customs and other taxes in respect of all goods, wares, merchandizes, commodities and property whatsoever," in the one section, must mean the same thing as " duties and taxes of export. import, and transit on goods, wares, and merchandizes," in the other. The two sections have perfectly distinct objects. The 25th section subjects to an additional check, in particular cases, a power which had previously existed and been used: the 98th section calls into action, but subject to a similar check, a new power, which it was supposed could not, before that enactment, be legally exercised.

HÏ.

Another objection, and one which I was surprised to hear from those who have opposed this regulation was, that, even if it be legal, this court has no authority to register it.

I am sorry that this gives me an occasion for stating the grounds on which I consider that the registration is necessary, and that without the registration of some regulation for the purpose, no such tax can be enforced in Calcutta.

The imposition of a tax, and the law by which it is to be enforced, are things easily distinguishable from each other; as easily as the judgment from the execution in a suit at law. In the English constitution, the imposition of a tax belongs to the Commons alone, though all branches of the legislature must concur in enforcing it. To borrow words attributed to Lord Chatham: "the taxes are a voluntary gift and grant of the Commons alone. In legislation, the three states of the realm are alike concerned, but the concurrence of the peers and the crown to a tax is only necessary to clothe it with the form of a law."

The two matters being distinct from each other in the view of the English law they have been kept distinct also in the act of the 53d Geo. III., c. 155; the 98th section provides for the imposition of the tax; the 99th for the law and regulation, by which it is to be enforced; the imposition is to be made by the government, the Board of Commissioners and Court of Directors; the regulation by the Governor-general in council, in the same way as other regulations are made.

In these latter words, however, there is a latent ambiguity, because the fact is. that the government has been used to make regulations in two ways; those for the interior being completed, according to the provisions of the 33d Geo, III. c. 142, s. 8, by registry in the judicial department, and transmission to the Court of Directors, whereas the regulations for Calcutta are registered in this court, under the 13th Geo. III., c. 63, s. 36, and are subject to appeal before the King in coun-This ambiguity causes the only difficulty. But surely it could not be meant to leave it to the option of the government to adopt either of the courses, according to its inclination, and as that inclination might vary from time to time. It seems to be a more reasonable meaning, that a tax regulation for the town of Calcutta is to be made in the same manner as other regulations for Calcutta are made.

Again; the 99th section does not require that the previous sanction of the authorities at home shall be obtained for the regulation, as the 98th requires it for the imposition of the tax; so that if registry in this court were not required, this would be a solitary instance, in which the Governor-general in council, by his own authority alone, could make regulations affecting British persons, as a class.

But there is a plainer ground than any of these inferences; the 13th Geo. Ill. c. 63, s. 36, which prescribes the mode of making regulations for the good order and Fort-William, provides that they shall not be valid, nor of any force or effect, until the same shall be duly registered and published in the Supreme Court. It cannot be contended, that the regulation in question, is not one which relates to the good order and civil government of the town, for it imposes penalties and forfeitures, permits houses to be searched, and gives to certain public officers a new authority to administer oaths, and interferes with some of the proceedings even of this court. Then I ask in what way has the provision in the 13th Geo. III. c. 63, s. 36 been repealed?

repealed? or if it be still amongst the statutes, by what reasonable argument can it be contended, that by the 99th sect, it is meant, that the court shall sustain indictments and informations for offences unknown to the criminal law, and arising only out of the infringement of an unregistered order of council?

The only arguments which I have heard against the necessity of registration are; first, that it must be supposed, that the sanction of the Board of Commissioners and Court of Directors was substituted by registration: but this supposition falls to the ground, if the sanction is required, as I have pointed out, for the imposition of the tax only, and not for the regulation. Secondly, it is said, that all interference of this court in matters of revenue is prohibited by the 21st Geo. III. c. 70. s. 8; but the obvious answer to this is that, that clause had relation only to the then existing state of the revenue, and that it did not contemplate any revenue to be raised within Calcutta, nor upon British persons, for the raising of which no provision was made, except in specific cases, until the enacting in 1818 of the clauses which are now the main subject of our consideration; and those clauses, and the 107th of the same act, having given to this court a new jurisdiction in matters of revenue affecting Calcutta and British persons, have left that portion of the revenue system entirely unaffected by the 21st Geo. III. c. 70,

If the regulations for enforcing taxes imposed under the authority of the 98th section of the 53d Geo. III. c. 155, must be registered in the supreme court, it is plain that previous to registry no information could be filed even for the purpose of recovering the mere amount of the tax itself because the 100th section, which gives the right to file such informations, and which is a penal clause, gives the right only in case of any breach of any law or regulation: so that a regulation must have been completed, and infringed, before the information will lie.

The remaining objections which were made on the part of the petitioners applied to the details of the regulation.

It was objected to some of the clauses that they gave a power to the Board of Revenue of imposing daily fines of unlimited amount upon those who should persist in their offence; but this is not so: their power of fining is limited by the amount of the first fine being fixed, and though the commissioners may direct a smaller daily fine to be afterwards levied, they cannot impose a larger.

Again; it was said, that a right of searching the houses of the heirs, executors, or administrators, of the distributors of stamps was given: but it is not the fact that a Assatic Journ. Vol. 25. No. 146.

right of entering the houses is given, but of demanding a search, and imposing a fine, if it be refused; and it will be found that the regulation is, in this respect, much surpassed in severity by enactments in the English statutes, relating to the representatives of the assignees of insolvent debtors, into whose hands the property of the insolvents has come; by others, conferring the right of searching houses for the property of bankrupts; by others, empowering the officers of Excise to break open doors to detect the illicit manufacture of Exciscable articles; and by the law, which would be applicable to the representatives of persons dying with crown property in their hands, such as stamped paper, not yet paid for.

Another clause which was objected to, was that one whereby the members of the board of revenue are empowered to administer oaths, and it was seriously contended, that nothing less than a new act of parliament could confer such an authority. This court acknowledges that the authority must be derived from parliament, but we are of opinion, that when the power was conferred by parliament upon the Governor-general in Council and the court, of making and registering regulations for the good order and civil government of the town, the power was included of providing for the investigation of matters of fact, by taking evidence on oath, before persons to be duly emstituted under such regula-

A further objection was made against the clause by which a penalty is imposed for filing in any court of justice certain unstamped papers.

I have already pointed out that this court has no right to make a question of the expediency of any part of this tax, but only to see that it does not exceed legal bounds, and then to assist in enforcing it by due regulations. The legality of a stamp duty on papers to be used in law proceedings it would be difficult to deny when it has so long subsisted in England. The method of enforcing it by fining those who file unstamped papers, is taken from an act of the Imperial parliament, though applicable only to Ireland; and it seems to me to be less objectionable for Calcutta, than the mode which has been long pursued in England; namely, that of making unstamped papers inadmissible as evidence. I am not, indeed, at present, aware of any less oppressive course by which the duty could be enforced here; and it would have been as well if those who have argued against these penalties had shewn us some better methods by which, with equal efficiency, we might have enforced a tax, which, if it be legal, we are bound by the most solemn obligations of duty to maintain.

For my own part, though I admit that many English enactments are quite incapable of application to this country, yet I consider the laws of the country to be my best standard for general purposes, and a guide too valuable to be abandoned before another presents itself.

With a reference to the whole of the objections which have been made, I admit that, according to my view of the matter, the regulation might, in some of its parts, have been amended with advantage; but I do not find any thing which is repugnant to law, nor do I think that it will, in effect, be oppressive to the inhabitants of Calcutta, considering that it must be enforced by proceedings in this court. The decision of the court is, therefore, that the regulation shall be registered.

V.

It remains for me to say a few words upon some matters which are only incidental to this proceeding.

An assertion has been made of the absolute right of the inhabitants of Calcutta to be heard, and heard by means of the advocates of the court, before a regulation can be registered. I am of opinion, that no such right exists. This is not a suit at law, or in equity, but a very peculiar function of the court prescribed by statute, and more of a legislative than a judicial character; and I know of no foundation on which such a right can rest; though there is no doubt that any petitioner would have as strong a claim to be so heard as those have, who are heard at the bar of the houses of parliament, or before the Privy Council. It seems to be necessary to state thus much, because, if a regulation were liable to be invalidated by a refusal to hear counsel against it, we might have a thousand petitions filed, by which the registration might be retarded ad infinitum; whilst the circumstances of the country might require the immediate enactment of the law. It is only, however, for the purpose of establishing the right of the court to prescribe and control the mode of hearing these petitions, that I mention the matter at all. In all such cases, the court must be desirous to have as much information as possible: it would be a wrong and capricious exercise of power to preclude a previous discussion of a matter which is subject to appeal; and I know of no channel, through which the court could receive any objections against a regulation, more conveniently or more agreeably to themselves, than through the advocates of the court.

Another question has been made as to the extent to which the court is called upon to enter into the merits of a regulation. I agree, in the main, with an opinion expressed upon this point in a judgment which I have read of Sir Edward West's; namely, that the words of the statute oblige the court to consider the expediency as well as the legality of a regu-But at the same time, I am satisfied that, in general, we have not the means in this country of obtaining, within any moderate time, the whole information, which would be necessary to come to a satisfactory decision as to the expediency; and that we must, in a great measure. he guided in that respect by the opinion of others, who have greater means and better opportunities. In this case, however, the question is scarcely raised, for we clearly have nothing to do with the expediency of the tax, but only of the regulation by which it is enforced. I am anxious to point this out, lest it should be supposed that I do express any opinion on this occasion, as to the expediency of the tax, or its alleged inequality; I have not the requisite information; nor, if I had, should I be called upon, or entitled, to apply it here for that purpose.

Sir John Franks.—The Chief Justice of this court, Sir Charles Grey, expressed his opinion, that the counsel for the petitioners had not a right to be heard against the registration of the stamp regulation, proposed to be registered, and now before this court; but at the same time declared, he was willing to hear the petitioners' counsel, because of the important subject of the petition. Having carefully considered the question of right, I agree in opinion with Sir Charles Grey; that it does not exist. Whether such a right exist or not, depends upon the 36th section of the statute of 1773, 13th Geo. III. c. 63.

It enacts, that it shall be lawful for the Governor general and council to make and issue rules, ordinances, and regulations for the good order and civil government of the United Company's settlement at Fort William, and other factories subordinate thereto, as shall be reasonable; such rules not being repugnant to the laws of the realm; and to impose fines and forfeitures for the breach of such rules.

But, nevertheless, the same, or any of them, shall not be valid, until the same shall be registered and published in the supreme court, with the consent and approbation of the said court, which registry shall not be made until the expiration of twenty days after the same shall be published, and a copy thereof affixed in some conspicuous part of the court-house, and from and immediately after such registry, the same shall be valid in law.

The section then makes it lawful for any person in India to appeal therefrom to his majesty in council: so as such appeal, or notice thereof, be lodged within the space of sixty days after the registering and publishing the same.

A right of appeal is given by the words of the 36th section, against the rule and regulation; but it has not expressed any thing as to a petition to the supreme court against the registration. To supply the omission, to give, expressly, a right to be heard against the registration, it has been argued, that a right of appeal implies a right to be heard, and by counsel. against the registration of the rule and regulation. I do not feel the force of this argument; because an appeal against the rule is, by this section, to be lodged within sixty days after the time of registering, but the registration becomes valid twenty days after it has been published. One person may petition (if the claim of right is founded) to be heard against the registration, and never appeal. Another may, after the registration, appeal without having petitioned And I do not think, I ought to imply a construction, that might promote an inconvenience. But I have not any doubt, that this court at all times would be desirous to hear any petitioner, hy his counsel, against the registration of any such rule: it would be a mode likely to suggest legal grounds of consideration to the court upon any such subject.

I come to the objections made to the registration of this regulation.

The counsel for the petitioners have made three objections to the registration of the stamp regulation in question.

1st .- That there is not any authority, of law, to impose a stamp duty in Calcutta.

2d .- Nor any authority of law, to justify the registration of such a rule, as imposes the stamp duty in question, (if admissible,) it being perfect without registration.

3d.—That the rule offered is not proper for registration.

The rule in question contains annexed to it a schedule of the duties to be raised: places the conduct of them under the care of the board of revenue of Calcutta, and contains several clauses that pre-cribe the duties to be performed by the officers to sell and distribute stamps.

The 6th section of the 9th clause—the 15th and 16th of the 9th-the 3d of the 11th and the 15th clause; are those to which objections have been made.

The clauses are objected to, because they give powers to fine; some arbitrary, some exorbitant; and last because they would give powers to officers of the revenue to administer oaths in that department.

In answer to these objections to the present stamp regulation; it appears to me, that although there is a discretionary power confided to the board of revenue, yet an objection ought not to prevail from that cause; because it is a power whereby they may reduce, but cannot increase the fine to which any distributor may be liable. This will appear by reference to the 6th, 15th, and 16th clauses of the 9th section, by which that discretion has been given the board of revenue.

As to exorbitance, before it shall be pronounced, that these rules admit exorbitant fines, it ought to be considered what the duty of a distributor of stamps is, with respect to the public; and what ought to be the objects of a stamp regulation with respect to that duty.

As a receiver, his duty is to account with the board of revenue upon behalf of the East India Company, and his office makes him answerable for breaches of duty; in a moral point of view, offences against the rules, if he shall not give up sums of money he had received as distributor, or his accounts upon demand. The fines and penalties given by these sections or rules, are sanctions for the performance of both duties.

And in considering of them, I shall show what has been imposed by the law as a penalty, because of a fraudulent breach of duty, upon persons entrusted in offices; independent of the statutes that give summary jurisdiction for recovering penaltics given by revenue law; and shall then refer to some of those laws.

By the statute 7th Edw. VI. c. 1, it is enacted, that if any receive: or accountant shall receive of any person, for the payment of any fees, annuities, pensions, or duties, more than he may lawfully receive, the person so offending shall forfeit to the party grieved 6s. 8d. for every penny or pennyworth so taken or received -Stadling v. Morgan, Plow. 202.

The occasion of passing that statute appears in the case referred to. It means a receiver of the king. The penalty given by that statute amounts to 80 times the amount of the sum fraudulently received.

By the 58 Geo. III. c. 81, distributors of stamps are to verify their accounts upon oath; penalty £40.

The fine by the 6th section (objected to) imposed upon a distributor, who refuses to permit his accounts to be inspected, is 100 rupees, to be daily increased upon daily refusal.

In the one case, the distributor is liable to four times as much, for a single offence, as the other. Obstinate refusal, in the clauses objected to, increases the daily fine.

The 15th section was objected to because it gives the collector a right of search of the house after a refusal; but upon a reference to the section, it does not give such a right; it gives a right to the collector to demand to make search for stores of stamps and accounts of the deceased distributor, from the person administering his effects, and makes the person refusing it subject to a penalty. Such a right may be prevented by compliance upon demand; but it is not unusual to give even such powers by summary laws for recovering penalties: thus by the act 1st Geo. IV. c. 74, section 45, an act relating to distilleries in Scotland; if an excise officer shall be refused admittance into a distillery after demand, he shall be liable to two hundred pounds penalty, and if admittance shall not be given, it shall be lawful for the officer refused to enter upon such distillery.

The last clause of the regulation has been objected to, because it gives power to collectors of revenue, and other officers vested with charge of offices for sale of stamps, to administer oaths.

I conceive the Governor-general and council have authority to give such power.

By the 36th section of the statute, 13th Geo. III. c. 63, they have power to make rules and regulations for the good order and government of this presidency, and to impose fines and forfeit for breach of them.

And having had such authority given to them to impose duties and taxes upon Calcutta, as by the 98th section, 53d Geo. III; by the 99th section of that act, they are also empowered to make rules and regulations respecting such duties and taxes. And such power authorizes them, in my judgment, to make rules to enforce payment of such duties as have been imposed by them, by authority of the British parliament. By the 55th Geo. III. c. 81, section 12, the commissioners of stamps, or one or more of them, may administer oaths to carry that act into effect. There to carry that act into effect. are similar provisions in several statutes to enforce payment of penalties. power to administer oaths is incident to judicial authority, or conferred by act of parliament. In the hearing causes in the superior court, or before justices of peace at sessions, on taking informations, it is incident to their judicial authority. It is not incident to the office as ministerial.

The statute 15th Geo. III c. 39, provides thus: "Whereas, it is frequently necessary for justices of the peace to administer oaths when penalties are to be levied, or distresses to be made in pursuance of acts of parliament, which they have no power to administer:" it then proceeds to give them power to administer oaths for that purpose.

The authority to administer oaths given by the last section of the regulation objected to, is derived from the same source that authority to administer oaths is given to justices of peace in matters not judicial; that of the legislature.

The inconvenience to the public from delay, waiting the progress of a suit at law or equity, and the cost to the distributor, might be great, if summary means were not given to call collectors of the revenue, in many cases, to account: summary laws have, therefore, been found expedient in such cases.

I come now to the proposition of the learned counsel for the petitioners, that there is not authority, by law, to impose a stamp duty to be paid within Calcutta.

The question upon this part of the present subject depends upon the construction of the statute, 53rd Geo. III. c. 155, section 98. I shall not recur to the cases excited, as to the authority of parliament to enact the 98th and 99th sections of that statute. I find it in its enactment. It is my duty to respect the authority of the legislature, and when an occasion arises, as at present, to construe it according to the best of my judgment.

Counsel for the petitioners state, that, according to a rule of construction of statutes, the intention of the legislature ought to prevail. It is a rule of construction, but there are other rules, one of them (Plow. 108.) is, as in the case of the king r. Barchet:—" Such a sense is to be made, upon the whole, as that no clause, sentence, or word, shall prove void, or insignificant, if by any other construction, they may be made useful and pertinent."

Every part of the 98th section is material to show that the power of taxation thereby given, was intended to be a power to impose taxes upon Calcutta, in as full and ample a manner as the said governors and conneil could, at the time of its enactment, impose duties and taxes to be raised and levied, or paid, upon any other person or place whatsoever.

This section commences with a preamble, not connected with, or referring to any other of the statute, and recites that "Whereas, it is expedient that the government of the said company established at Fort William, Madras, &c." " should have authority to impose duties and taxes to be imposed within the several towns of Calcutta and Madras, &c. and enacts that it shall be lawful for the Governor-general of Fort William, &c. to impose all such duties of customs and other taxes to be levied and paid within the towns of Calcutta, &c. and upon, and by all persons whatsoever resident or being therein, and upon, and by all merchandizes, commodities, and property whatsoever, in any such country or place, in as full, large, and ample a manner as such Governor-general in council (&c.) may now impose any duties or taxes to be levied or paid by any persons whomsoever, or in any place whatsoever, within the authority of the said governments.'

It then provides as to the approbation of the Directors and Board of Control, of any rule that shall be made by the Governor-general and council, pursuant to such authority.

Were we to adopt the argument of the counsel for the petitioners, to its extent, we should reject the general words in the preamble of this section, and all other words therein, that purport to give a power to the governor and council as extensive as they could exercise elsewhere, and we should confine the power given to the Governor-general in council to levy taxes. to export, import and transit, of goods, as in the 25th section of the 53d Geo. 111. c. 155. And we are required by the counsel for the petitioners to confine that power to export, import, and transit of goods, because export, import, and transit of goods are mentioned in the 25th section; but the 98th section has not any connexton with the 25th section. The 25th section was intended so to provide for the protection of persons, who should become tiaders to the East Indies, by virtue of the provision of the 53rd Geo. III. c. 155. as that they should not, in the course of such trade, be chargeable with any duties likely to affect their commercial intercourse with the Company's territory, of which they should not have public notice.

By the 6th section of that statute, it was made lawful for any of his majesty's sub-pany, to export from any ports of Great Britain and Ireland, to all ports of the Company in the East Indies, subject to the several conditions and regulations prescribed by that statute.

But as his Majesty's subjects who should avail themselves of the privilege of trade given to them by that section, might be hable to pay duties imposed within any of the presidencies in India, of which sufficient public notice had not been given; it was provided by the 25th section of that statute, that no new or additional imposition of any duty or tax upon the export, import or transit of goods, wares, or merchandizes, made by such authority, should be valid until it should have the sanction of the Court of Directors of the hast India Company, with the approba-tion of the Board of Commissioners. The section provides for the mode of expressing that approbation to the government in India.

Duties upon export, import, and transit of goods, were those by which such traders were most likely to be charged, and they are expressly mentioned in the 25th section. But the legislature had a different object enacting the 98th section, its object then was to give a power to impose taxes upon the town of Calcutta, and the other places mentioned in the section as fully as the Governor-general and council, and governors, &c. could have done in any other place within their authority. In the 25th section it, therefore, used particular words, export, import, and transit, and the 98th section gave authority, by general words, to impose taxes.

The intention of the legislature is, as the petitioners' counsel herein stated, a rule by which statutes are to be interpreted, and taking the words of the 98th section, the legislature must have intended that the governor and council could have imposed taxes, lawfully within other places within their authority, besides Calcutta, Madras, &c. mentioned in that section as the places to which the authority thereby given was to extend; and, in fact, it has been shewn by the counsel against the petition, and by the chief justice of this court, that a stamp duty was then payable within the Mofussil.

The statute 54 Geo. 111. c. 105, as it appears to me, furnishes some comment upon this part of the case.

It recites that doubts had arisen as to certain duties theretofore imposed by the governors of Fort William, &c. and proceeds to cuact, that all duties of customs, and others theretofore made and imposed, as well upon British subjects as foreigners, by authority of said governments within Calcutta, &c., and also upon all persons, whomsoever resident, or being in any country or place within the authority of said governments, and in respect of all goods, wares, and merchandizes whatsoever, and all orders relating to them, and all fines theretofore imposed for non-payment of such duties, shall be valid, as fully as if same were imposed by authority of the statute 58rd Geo. III. c. 155.

This statute shows further, that at the time the act of 1753 was passed, there were various duties and taxes payable in the Mofussil.

The statute does not recite or state the canses of doubt as to these duties and taxes; the duty might have been legal, yet not imposed with due forms, but that statute has made such as had been levied, valid, as if imposed by authority of the 53rd Geo. H1, and a stamp tax was, in fact, amongst the taxes in force at that time, without those towns.

I come now to the 3rd head.

The petitioners' counsel argue, that the regulation in question does not require registration.

I do not agree with them. By the 99th section 53rd Geo, III, the governor and council have authority to make laws and regulations, respecting such duties and taxes, and to impose fines, penalties, and forfeitures for non-payment of them, in as full and ample manner as the governor and council may impose any other fines or penalties.

The manner by which the governor and council may impose any other fines or penalties upon any British subjects of Fort William, is by making a rule or regulation to prescribe a duty, and then imposing a fine or penalty for the breach of it, to have such rule or regulation registered with the approbation of the supreme court, by the authority of the statute 18th Geo. III. c. 63, s. 36.

gistered

Such a form as required by that section gives notice to the subject of the law by which he may be bound, gives to it promulgation. And the law by which the British subjects might be bound in this place, should be first promulgated to them.

The 36th section, 13th Geo. III. has provided for the public notification and registration of any rule or regulation, the governor in council might make here to affect the British subject.

The 25th section, 63rd Geo. III. has provided also for the promulgation of rules, by which persons who might trade to India, by virtue of the provisions of that statute might be affected.

The section 99th, 53rd Geo. III. c. 155, enacts, that it shall be lawful for the Governor-general in council to make laws and regulations respecting such duties, (those to be imposed by the 98th section) to impose fines, penalties and forfeitures, for non-payment thereof, in as full a manner as such governor and council may now make laws and regulations, and impose any fines, penaltics, or forfeitures whatsoever. But by the 36th section, 13th Geo. III.no regulation, fine, or penalty can be imposed upon British subjects, until it shall be previously registered, according to the form thereby prescribed, with the approbation of this court.

The stamp duty regulation now proposed would affect British subjects, and, therefore, in my judgment, it requires registration.

The power given to the Governor-general and council to make regulations, by the 99th section, 53rd Geo. III. and to impose fines, penalties, &c. in as ample manner as the Governor-general in council may now make regulations and impose fines, refers to a power, by some means, given before. The 13th Geo. III. referred to, section 36, gives them such a power, provided the regulation shall, as thereby directed, be duly registered. The present rule, therefore, also, in my judgment, ought to be registered.

These sections ought to be considered together. They form a part of the same code of laws, and are affirmative statutes, the latter not repealing the former. And it is a rule of law, upon the construction of statutes, "that all which relate to the same subject, must be taken as one system, and constructed consistently: and the practice has been such in cases of bankruptcy, church cases, and other cases,—Rex v. Lowale.

It was objected by the petitioners' counsel, that the rule and regulation in question was made in the name of the Vicepresident, and not of the Governor-general, But the statute 33d Geo. III. c. 52, has authorised the Vice-president to act with such powers as by the government of Fort St. George and Bombay may be exercised, and the statute 53d Geo. III. c. 155, a. 98, has extended to the governors of the several presidencies the power to impose taxes, as by that statute.

Upon the whole, it appears to me, the stamp regulation in question has been made in terms that admit registration; that it has been made by competent authority; and that this court ought to order it to be registered.

Sir Edward Ryan.—I might, after the clear and luminous judgment which has been pronounced by the learned Chief Justice, content myself with simply expressing my assent to the registry of this stamp regulation; but that I feel, in a matter of such importance, it must be more satisfactory to those who are to be affected by this decision, to know the reasons which have operated on the minds of each of the Judges.

In my own case, I feel it the more incumbent upon me to adopt this course. because, upon some of the questions which have arisen in the course of this discussion, I entertain opinions differing, in some degree, from the other members of the court; these opinions I think it right to explain, although I admit, they do not materially affect the matter at present under our consideration, but rather apply to our future government, in deciding upon the rejection or admission of regulations proposed to us for registry. I am also desirous not to be misunderstood or misrepresented, and as the matter now before the court has excited much interest in this place, and is, (as we are told by the learned counsel), likely to be discussed in various ways at home, it is necessary that I should be cautious, that sentiments and opinions may not be imputed to me, as one of the court, which I have never entertained, and that I may not be supposed to act on reasons or grounds, which, in truth, have no influence in directing my judgment.

Before I enter upon the reasons which have induced me to consent to the registry of this stamp regulation, I think it fit to state my opinion upon the two following questions:—

First,—As to what I conceive is the duty cast upon the court, when called upon by the 36th section of the 13th Geo. III. c. 63, to register rules, ordinances, and regulations, for the good order and civil government of the United Company's settlement at Fort William, made by the Governor-general in council.

Secondly,—As to whether persons, who will be affected by any regulations, bare a right to be heard, either by themselves or counsel, counsel, prior to such regulations being registered in this court.

As to the first question :- The act of the 13th Geo. III. c. 63. s. 36, provides.

registered in this court.

As to the first question:—The act of the 13th Geo. III. c. 63. s. 36, provides,

"That it shall and may be lawful for the Governor-general and Council of the said Company's settlement at Fort William, in Bengal, from time to time, to make and issue such rules, ordinances, and regulations, for the good order and civil government of the said United Company's settlement at Fort William aforesald, and other factories and places subordinate, or to be subordinate thereto, as shall be deemed just and reasonable, (such rules, ordinances, and regulations not being repugnant to the laws of the realm,) and to set, impose, and inflict, and levy reasonable fines and forfeitures for the breach or non-observance of such rules, ordinances, and regulations but, nevertheless, the same or any of them shall not be valid, or of any ordinance, and regulations but, nevertheless, the same or any of them shall not be valid, or of any ordinance, and regulations but, nevertheless, the same of the court of the court of undicature, which shall be, by the substitute of the said of the court-house, or place where the said Supreme Court shall be held; and from and immediately after such registry as aforesald, the same shall be logod and valid in law; but, nevertheless, it shall be lawful for any person or persons in India to appeal therefrom to his Majesty, his helrs or successors, in council, who are hereby empowered, if they think fit, to set aside and repeal any such rules, ordinances, and regulations, so as such appeal or notice thereof be logied in the New Court of Judicature, within the space of sixty days after the time of the registering and publishing the same; and it shall be lawful for any person or person or person or person or head of the commence, while sixty days as a such appeal or notice thereof be logied in the New Court of Judicature, which as a copy of all such rules, ordinances, and regulations, from time to time, as the same shall be conceived, shall be affixed in some conspicuous and public pl

The plain meaning of the commencement of this section is, that all rules, ordinances, and regulations, made by the Governor-general and Council, are to be just and reasonable, and not repugnant to the laws of the realm; but, "nevertheless," that is, though just and reasonable, and not repuguant to the laws of the land, they are not to be of any force or effect until registered in this court with its "consent and approbation." What other reasonable construction can be put on the words "consent and approbation," than than that this court,, in respect of all regulations proposed to it for registry, has legislative as well as judicial functions to perform, and that it has full power to reject any regulations, though they be not repugnant to the laws of the realm, if in its judgment such regulations are upon the whole inexpedient? Such I conceive to be the power intended to be vested in this court by this act of parliament, in which words so comprehensive as "consent and approbation" have been used: and however inconvenient, in my own view, I may think the union of the judicial and legislative character to be, and however painful and burthensome the duty cast upon the court, still I am not able, after the best consideration I can give the subject, to come to any other conclusion. I am the more confirmed in this view, when I consider that the same construction has been put on this section by the East India Company, as is apparent from all the proceedings in the appeal of Mr. Buckingham to the King in council, against a regulation registered in this court.

I cannot, after arriving at the conclusion that we have the full power of entering into the consideration of the question of expediency, see how this court can properly discharge its duty otherwise than by considering the expediency as well as the legality of every regulation proposed for registry. I know how incompetent a tribunal this is for both the discussion and decision of a variety of questions which may be thus subjected to its consideration. That this court is ill calculated for some of the functions it has to perform, may be a forcible argument in favour of a change in its constitution; yet while the power remains, I think the court has not the option of electing to perform a part only of the duty which has been cast upon it. I would further observe, that although I think the duty cast upon the Judges burthensome and painful, I wish not to be understood as expressing an opinion, that the Governor-general and Council should have vested in them the sole power of passing regulations for the good order and civil government of this place, without some review of their proceedings; nor that cases might not arise within this presidency, where the rejection of regulations, on the grounds of inexpediency, would not be a duty as simple as if the objection had been merely of a nature strictly legal.

The next preliminary question is, as to the right of parties to be heard against the registry of any regulation.

Now, it appears by the section of the act which I have already cited, that the registry of regulations cannot be made, although the court consents and approves of the same, "until the expiration of twenty days after the same shall be openly published, and a copy thereof affixed in some conspicuous part of the court-house or place where the Supreme Court shall be held." What I would ask, is the extent and meaning of these words? they cannot be intended for the purpose of allowing the court time to deliberate upon the regu lations proposed to be registered; for if this part of the section was omitted altogether, the court would have exactly the same power as it now possesses; namely, to postpone the registry to any period it may think necessary for deliberation, there being no limited time in which the court must reject or assent to the registry, the other hand, although the court does at once assent and approve, the registry cannot take place until the twenty days expire. These words cannot therefore be considered in this sense, as applicable to the court. If these words cannot be construed as intending to give the court time to deliberate; was it the intention of the legislature, that this delay in the registry should take place, in order that the public might be informed, of what the court was about to pass into a law? Now it is usual to promulgate laws after they are passed, that all may be informed of their duties and liabilities; but it is not usual to proclaim what is about to be formed into a law. I cannot therefore think the object was merely to inform the public of what the court was about to do, unless it was also the intention of the legislature, to give those who were so informed, an opportunity of stating their objections to what was proposed to be carried into a law. I am the more confirmed in this view, when I consider that there is a power of appeal from the decision of this court to the King in Council, before which tribunal, I conceive, the parties appealing would have a right to be heard; and if this be so, it seems inconsistent and contradictory to say, that the parties cannot be heard before the inferior tribunal, whose decision is appealed against, although they may claim to be heard before the superior. As far as usage has any effect in explaining the meaning of this section, the view that I have taken appears to be correct, it having been the uniform practice of this court since its institution, to hear counsel when applying for that purpose, against any regulation proposed to be registered; and it having been also expressly decided in this place, as we are informed by one learned judge, that the public had a right to be heard. Upon these grounds I think that the parties affected by any regulation, have a right to be heard against its registry; but I think that this is a right subject to limitation and control. It is not contended at the bar, that every individual affected by the regulation has a right to appear, either by his counsel or by himself, to state his own particular views and objections; it is only contended, that the public collectively have a right to be heard, it resting entirely with the court to determine the time and mode in which they will heaf their objections, as well as the number of persons to be heard.

I now come to the questions more immediately before us. The Advocate-general applies to this court to register a regulation, for raising and levying stamp duties within the town of Calcutta, in order that penalties contained in such regulation may be enforced in this court, A petition is presented, and the petitioners are heard by counsel against the registry; all the objections urged appear to me to arise out of the construction that is to be put on the 98th and 99th sections of the 53d Geo. III., c. 155.

The 98th section is as follows. (Here the learned judge read the section.)

This section, it is stated by Mr. Advo. cate-general, empowered the Vice president, under and with the sanction of the Court of Directors, and with the apprebation of the Board of Commissioners for the affairs of India, to impose a stamp duty within the town of Calcutta, and that the imposition of the tax was complete and perfect, without the sanction of this court. But that, under the 99th section. which empowered the Governor-general in council to impose fines, &c. for the nonpayment of the duties, &c. to be levied, it was expedient, as doubts had arisen, to have the regulation imposing such fines, &c. registered in this court.

The petitioners object to this court registering a regulation for the enforcement of fines, &c., for the non-payment of a tax, which they contend there was no authority to impose.

They also contend, that even if the court should be of opinion that there was sufficient authority to impose this tax, yet that the regulation for carrying it inclient illegal, and inexpedient. Such are the general grounds of objection.

Now whether this tax has been legally imposed, depends entirely on the construction that is to be put on the 98th section of the 53d Geo. III. c. 155. I should say, had not doubts apparently arisen upon the minds of those whose judgment and learning I respect, that a more clear, and intelligible section of an act of parliament I never read, and I must confess, from the first time that I saw this section down to the present, I never have for a single moment doubted of the construction that was to be put upon it, further than a diffidence I could not help feeling, when what appeared so clear to my understanding was not so to that of others. The preamble recites, Whereas it is expedient that the government of the said Company established at Fort William, &c. should have authority to impose duties and taxes, to be levied within the several towns of Calcutta, &c. Stop here, and apply the common rule of construction, that "the preamble is a good means for collecting the intent," (Com. Dig. Parliament, R. II.), which applies with greater force where it is affixed to a particular section. Can words be more general than "authority to impose duties and taxes?" either word is sufficiently comprehensive to include within it the present tax. Duties on vellum, &c. are the words of the stamp act of 5 and 6, W. and M. c. 21. follows the enacting part of the section, containing the words to impose all such duties of customs, and other taxes, but even as if to guard against the possibility of a case like the present, that plain words were not to be construed according to their obvious meaning, nor according to the intent pointed out in the preamble, the statute goes on : " be it therefore enacted, that it shall and may be lawful to and for the Governor-general in council of Fort William in Bengal, and to and for the Governor in council of Madras, and to and for the Governors in council of Bombay and Prince of Wales' Island, within the repective presidencies of Fort William, Fort St. George, Bombay, and Prince of Wales' Island, to impose all such duties of customs and other taxes to be levied. raised, and paid within the said towns of Calcutta, Madras, the said town and island of Bombay, and Prince of Wales' Island, and upon and by all persons whomsoever resident or being therein respectively, and in respect of all goods, wares, merchandizes, commodities, and property what werer also being therein respectively; and also upon and by all persons whomsoever, whether British born or foreigners resident or being in any country or place within the authority of the said go-vernments respectively, and in respect of all goods, wares, merchandizes, commodities and property whatsoever being in any such country or place, in as full, large and ample manner as such Governorgeneral in council, or Governors in council respectively, may now lawfully impose any duties or taxes to be levied, raised, or paid, upon or by any persons whomsoever, or in any place whatsoever, within the authority of the said governments respectively,"

Now, what taxes might the Governor-general in council impose at the time of passing the 53d of Geo. III.? If the Governor-general in council might, at the time of passing this act, impose any duties or taxes inpone any person or in any place, excepting the town of Calcutta, &c, what other meaning can be given to the words of the act than that the legislature meant to take away the excepted case, and to give the same powers of taxation in Calcutta as in the mofussil? requiring, lower, that this power of taxation should never be exercised unless sanctioned by the Court of Directors and the Board of Commissioners.

The petitioners have, in order to obviate such an interpretation of this part of the statute, contended that, at the time it was passed, the Governor-general in council had no power to impose any duties or taxes upon any person whomsoever, or in any place whatsoever.

The court have already expressed its decided opinion, that the Governor in council had full power to impose any duties or taxes in the presidencies of Bengal, Assatic Journ. Vol. 25. No. 146.

Bahar, and Orissa, at the time of passing the 53d Geo. III., with the exceptions only which are recited in the preamble of this section. The origin of this power, and its continuation down to the present, has, I think, been accurately traced by Mr. Advocate-general, and I wish to state, that I entirely concur with the learned Chief Justice in the view which he has taken of this question; and the reasons and grounds which he has assigned, in support of that view, are to my mind so satisfactory and conclusive, that I think it unnecessary to occupy the time of the court by any useless repetition of them. The Governor-general in council having then, in the opinion of this court, at the time of passing the 53d of Geo. III., power to impose taxes of any description in the mofussil, and having prior to the statute exercised that power in a variety of instances, the exercise of which power has been constantly recognized by Parliament, as the learned Chief Justice has so clearly pointed out; what other construction is it possible to put on this section, than that the legislature intended to give the same power of taxation in the town of Calcutta? I am aware that one of the leaned counsel for the petitioners ingeniously endeavoured to get rid of this construction, by construing the words "in as full, large, and ample manner," to apply to the mode of collection, not to the imposition of the tax; and contended that the meaning of this section was, that the Governor-general in council had power to levy and collect all duties of customs and other taves (meaning taxes cjusdem generis), in Calcutta, in as large and ample a manner as the Governor-general in council might now levy and collect any duties or taxes in the mofussil. This mode of construction, if correct, would not be affected by showing, that the Company had the most extensive power of taxation in the mofussil: but I cannot for a moment think, that the words will bear this interpretation, so contrary to their plain and obvious meaning. I am therefore clearly of opinion, that this tax has been legally imposed.

With the expediency or inexpediency of such a tax, the court has nothing whatever to do; fortunately, as I think, that question has in the present instance been withdrawn from its consideration, and I beg to be understood as expressing no opinion whatever on the expediency or inexpediency of the measure itself.

The only questions that remain for consideration, after being satisfied that the tax is legally imposed, are, whether the regulation for carrying it into effect is either repugnant to the laws of the realm, or upon the whole, so inexpedient, that this court, in the exercise of a sound discretion, onght to refuse to register it? 2 L But

But before I enter more particularly into the consideration of the regulation itself, I would make one or two observations on the 99th section of the 53d Geo. III., c. 155: the words are, "that it shall and may be lawful for such Governor-general in council, and Governors in council, respectively, to make laws and regulations respecting such duties and taxes, and to impose fines, penalties, and forfeitures for the non-payment of such duties and taxes, or for the breach of such laws or regulations, in as full and ample manner as such Governor-general in council, or governors in council, respectively, may now lawfully make any other laws or regulations, or impose any other fines, penaltics, or forfeitures whatsoever.'

The 98th section empowered the Governor-general in Council, in manner therein described, to impose this tax; but it is the section I have just cited that provides for the carrying the imposition of the tax into effect, and that is by making laws and regulations in as full and ample manner as such Governor-general in Council may now lawfully make any other laws or regulations, or impose any other fines, penalties or forfeitures; it does not go on to say upon any person whomsoever, or in any place whatsoever, which words, if contained in this section would, according to the con-struction which has been put upon them in the 98th section, have given the Governor-general in Council the same power of imposing fines and penalties in Calcutta, as he now possesses in the Mofussil; but there is no extension of this kind. What power then did the Governor-general possess of making regulations and imposing fines affecting persons, within the town of Calcutta, at the time this statute passed? for that power, and that only, is given to the Governor-general in Council obvious, that all regulations in any way affecting the inhabitants of Calcutta, must at the time the statute passed have been registered in this Court. I have therefore no doubt of the necessity of registering this regulation before any penalties or forfeitures of any kind can be enforced; and construing the 100th section, in conjunction with the two preceding sections, I am clearly of opinion, that no information can be sustained in this Court, but for penalties and forfeitures, the imposition of which had been authorized by regulations duly registered.

Being then of opinion, that the imposition of this tax is lawful, and that any regulation for the enforcement of the tax must be registered, the only remaining question is, whether the present regulation is such as the Court will, either on the grounds of illegality or inexpediency, reject.

It was stated by the learned Chief Justice, when this part of the subject was under discussion at the bar, that he for one would not reject a regulation like the present, because there were technical informalities, or because the language was not of the most precise and definite nature. I expressed my concurrence in that opinion, but at the same time, gave as one of my reasons, what on reflection I find to be incorrect, and in which I think I ought to put myself right ; I stated, that the time it would take to correct any such informalities, if rejected. was a ground with me for not giving them the same attention, as if the regulation had only to be referred back for correction to the Vice-president in council here, forgetting that it was not necessary to send this regulation home. I have been informed that it is the opinion of the government of this place, that they have not authority to propose this regulation for registry in any other form; and that they cannot, without the assent of the Court of Directors and Board of Commissioners, alter any part. Practically, therefore, that would take place, which I have anticipated, if this regulation was rejected: but I think the Court can only look at this as what indeed it purports to be, the regulation of the Vicepresident in Council liere, and as such may be returned for alteration without the inconvenience I had anticipated.

As to the powers which the government may conceive they possess on this subject. I think this Court can have nothing to do. As far as we are concerned, we can only look at it as a regulation passed here. I wish, therefore, to be understood as dismissing from my mind any allowance I might otherwise be disposed to make for informalities or want of technicality in the language, which I still think, supposing it to have been necessary for the regulation to have been sent home, I was quite at liberty to entertain on the general ground of expediency.

Upon the best consideration I have been able to give this subject, I think none of the provisions for enforcing the tax are illegal; but on the contrary, that if such a tax is to exist, the provisions are, upon the whole, expedient for carrying it into effect.

In the consideration of their legality and expediency, I have directed my attention to the provisions of the different acts of parliament, for the imposition of stamp duties in England and Ircland, thinking that, if I found the provisions of this stamp regulation according with what had already received the approbation of the legislature, that I should fairly presume such provisions to be legal and expedient, unless some exceptions and distinction were presented to me peculiar to this country, 50 as to take such provisions out of the general rule. In those instances, where I could find no provisions of a similar nature in the British acts of parliament, I have considered whether the provisions legal as well as expedient, and I wish to be understood as not adopting in these cases, as a test of their legality or expediency, that provisions of a similar nature may be found in British acts of parliament relating to different subjects, such as the excise and revenue laws.

I think that, if in this country, where a stamp tax is imposed for the first time, it could be shewn, that a regulation for the enforcement of such tax contained provisions and enactments more severe than any of the British acts of parliament relating to the same subject, from the time of 4 and 5 W. and M. down to the 55 of Geo. III.; such would be a ground for me at least to object to its registry.

I will now proceed to consider those parts of the regulation that have been objected to.

Section 9th, paragraphs six and fifteen, and the latter part of paragraph sixteen, were objected to on nearly the same grounds, namely, as to the uncertainty of the daily fine to he imposed, and that it was left to the discretion of the Board of Revenue to impose such daily fine as they might think fit. The true answer to this objection is the one suggested at the time by the learned Chief Justice, that although the Board of Revenue may direct the fine which is to be imposed, (which I think is the true construction of these paragraphs, though at the time of the discussion I entestamed a different opinion) yet, that the maximum of the fine is limited, by all rules of construction in penal statutes, to the sum mentioned as the forfeit for the first commission of the offence; and that, although the Board of Revenue may in their discretion impose a smaller fine, they cannot impose a greater.

I would further observe as to paragraphs six and fifteen, that the fine there to be imposed is on a vender or distributor of stamps; a person who, for the sake of profit, voluntarily subjects himself to the penalties imposed in case of non-compliance with the regulation.

Paragraph sixteen was also objected to, as subjecting the heir or personal representative to fines and penalties, excessive of themselves, and for which there was no precedent in any acts of parliament re-lating to stamp duties. There is certainly, as fir as I can discover, no precedent for this provision in any English or Irish acts of parliament; but, although I at first entertained some doubts on this paragraph, I do not, upon consideration, think it either illegal or inexpedient, but that in truth, the heir or personal representative is with this provision placed in a more secure situation than persons standing in the same relation to a vender or distributor of stamps in England; for there, be it remembered, the vender or distributor is, from the time of entering into his office, a debtor to the Crown, and all the effects of the heir or personal representative may be swept away by force of an extent for debts due to the Crown, contracted at any period after his acceptance of the office. Now, here it should be observed, that by the first part of this paragraph and by the previous sections, the collector, prior to demanding search, has before him facts on which to presume that stamped paper or other documents are in the possession of the representative of the deceased vender or distributor. He is not empowered to enter absolutely the house and search; but only to demand to search, which on refusal, subjects the party to a There is no power to enter into the house and search without the consent of the representative. Whereas the sheriff, in executing a writ of extent, may, after signifying the cause of his coming, and requesting to have the doors opened, upon refusal, break into the party's house, and either arrest him or take his goods.

The provisions of section 11, paragraph 1, are similar to the provisions of the 48th Geo. III. c. 149, s. 11, the 54th Geo. III. c. 100, s. 15, and c. 184, s. 11, and upon the principle I have already laid down, I consider them on that account as ..either illegal nor inexpedient.

As to section 11, paragraph 3, I think the penalty not uncertain, because the proper stamp can be ascertained by reference to the schedule, and the excess over the stamp used, being multiplied by five, ten, or twenty, as the case may be, fixes the amount of the fine.

Section 12, will be found to be similar to the 48th Geo. 111. c. 149, s. 28, the 52 Geo. 111. c. 126, s. 32, and the 55th Geo. 111. c. 81, s. 38.

Section 15, the last in the regulation, was objected to, principally because it was contended that the Court had no power of authorizing the persons therein mentioned, to administer an oath. Much stress was laid on this objection by counsel, but to me it appears a decisive answer to say, that Parliament has delegated to the Governor general in Council, the power of making rules and regulations for the good order and civil government of this place, which are, in the present instance, effective, upon being registered in this Court. If it has delegated this power, surely it must attach to it as an incident all that may be necessary to carry such regulations into effect; and what so usual and necessary as the investigation of matters of fact upon oath? to say, as has been argued, that this provision in the stamp regulation is contrary to law, because every oath must be warranted " by act of parliament or by the common law, time out of mind," is no objection to the present regulation; because I answer that if the warrant of Parliament is necessary, that such warrant exists in the present present case, they having delegated to the Governor-general in Council and this Court legislative powers.

I have stated the reasons which have induced me to consent to the registry of this stamp regulation; and it is a satisfaction to me to know, that there is another tribunal by which my judgment, if erroneous, may be corrected.

The following introductory remarks are prefixed to the judgments in the Government Gazette of July 30; they have produced some angry feelings amongst the opposers of the tax:—

"The judgments of the bench upon the lately agitated question of the stamp regulation will put our readers in possession of the whole course of argument set up on this occasion, and save them the trouble of toiling through much tedious and irrelevant discussion. A brief summary of the chief points in dispute, as derived from the decisions themselves, may perhaps not be an unacceptable introduction to the following columns, the extent of which has prevented their earlier publication, and leaves us no room for any other insertions. We should recommend, however, the perusal of the originals to those who take any interest in seeing how ingenious and laborious sophistry shrinks into nothing before legal profundity and common sense.

"The arguments against the stamp regulation, urged by the Counsel retained against the registry, resolved themselves into three heads, the denial of any authority in the government to levy duties in Calcutta, except such as were of a purely commercial nature; the absence of any necessity for registering the regulation at all; and its unbitness for regulation on account of the penalties it imposes and powers it confers.

" On the renewal of the charter, authority was duly given to all the local governments to impose upon all persons resident at the several presidencies, duties of customs and 'other taxes,' in as ample a manner as they had before been lawfully imposed. To this it was replied, that the words 'other taxes,' referred only to custom or transit duties, or their like, and that all duties previously imposed in India were illegal. The bench unanimously decided against such a perversion of language and facts, and vindicated, what no one ever before questioned, the acknowledged exercisc of the sovereign power in India by the Company, and the literal import of the words employed. What, indeed, would an Emperor of Delhi, even Akhber himself, have said, had any of his Jesuit friends attempted to subtilise away his sovereign rights; and what would the ghost of Lindley Murray say to those who argue that 'other' means 'similar' or same?

"With respect to the Registration, is was urged that the sanction of the Board of Control and Court of Directors having been previously obtained, the registration was unnecessary; and we must confess, that this seems to be a correct view of the case; but an important distinction was drawn by the Chief Justice between the imposing and enforcing the tax. The concurrence of the home authorities justifies the enactment, but the registration is necessary, before the supreme court can receive any motion relating to the enforcement of its provisions. The two other judges considered also the registration indispensable under various acts of parliament.

"With respect to the third objection, the bench concurred in thinking the provisions for enforcing the regulation no more than were required by its purport, less severe than analagous conditions frequent at home, and fully warranted by authority already given to the governments of India.

" With respect to every thing essential to the enforcement of the regulation, the judges of the supreme court have entertained and expressed but one opinion, and we may be satisfied that the ostensible grounds of the opposition to this act were wholly unfounded and untenable. On the right to be heard by counsel, against the registering of the regulations of this go. vernment, the learned judges differred; Sir Charles Grey and Sir John Franks denying its existence, whilst Sir Edward Ryan inferred, that the right to appeal to a higher tribunal, the King in Council, which is granted against all proposed regulations, involved the right to be heard before the inferior court. The bench, however, agreed as to the advantage of permitting regulations to be discussed before registration. The Chief Justice and Sir Edward Ryan, also concurred in holding, that the court is bound by the words of the statute to consider the expediency as well as the legality of a regulation. So J. Franks did not advert to the subject, and the question of expediency in this case was, in fact, not before court. The extent to which such a power is vested in the supreme judicature of the country, is a subject that has probably, before now, become matter of consideration at home, in consequence of the opinions promulgated at Bombay. The objections to its exercise, as far as regards the supreme court alone, are well stated by the Chief Justice, but is also a manifest, and might easily be a mischievous inconvenience, to have two legislative bodies, subjecting the determinations of the supreme administration to the revision and possible subversion of that, which, in the general government of the country, is a subordinate authority."

MISCELLANEOUS.

FRACAS ON THE RACE COURSE.

The last Calcutta papers speak of a fracas, which took place on the race course, on Sunday, 22d July, and which, it is stated, "has produced a considerable sensation amongst the community." have no room for a tenth part of what is written upon the subject in the different papers; the facts are shortly these. It appears that a Licutenant M'Donnell, formerly commander of a vessel belonging to Calcutta, was a passenger on board the II. C. ship Vansutart, outward bound, and that in consequence of some difference with Capt. Dalrymple, the commander of that vessel, Mr. M'Donnell and Mr. David Woodburn, a surgeon on the Bengal establishment, were excluded from the cuddy. Mr. M'Donnell declared he would appeal to the law for redress, and it is stated he did so on coming to Calcutta. Capt. Dalrymple also made a representation to the local government of the circumstances of the case, with reference to Mr. Woodburn, who was amenable to the government. Mr. M'Donnell afterwards claimed personal satisfaction from Capt Dalrymple, which the latter declined giving him; in consequence of which, Mr. M'Donnell, accompanied by a friend, (Mr. Sutherland,) on the Sunday evening, took an opportunity of insulting Capt. Dallymple on the race course, which is the promenade where the inhabitants of Calcutta take the air. In his information and deposition at the police office, Capt. Dalryinple swears that "as he was riding on the course, a buggy came up behind him with Mr. M'Donnell and Mr. Sutherland in it; the former called out, the moment he was in hearing, ' Dalrymple, you are a coward and a bully,' or words to that effect: Capt. Daltymple replied, 'you date not stop and tell me so.' They stopped, and he urged his horse close to the buggy, upon which M'Dounell repeated the above expression, and drawing a horse-whip from under him, struck at him, (Capt. Dalrymple,) who got off his horse and de-fended himself, several blows were interchanged, and they were separated by gentlemen on the spot." Mr. M'Donnell and Mr. Sutherland were bound over to keep the peace towards Capt. Dalrymple.

It is worthy of remark, that the friend of Mr. McDonnell, Mr. Sutherland, (the cr-decant Editor of the Calcutta Chronecte) is now the conductor of, or is connected with, the Bengal Hurkaru, the only paper which advocated the part of Mr. McDonnell in this affair. The fact, however, of its conductor being one of the parties, and therefore directly interested in the question, was concealed by the Hurkaru till the fact was promulgated in the John Bull, which paper adds to the allegations of Capt. Dalrymple, that, during the fracas, whilst Mr. M'Donnell was insulting Capt. Dalrymple, Mr. Sutherland called out to the latter, "You deserve it all, sir; you deserve it all!" It is clear, that a person who had so mixed himself with the transactions was unfit to pass a judgment upon the conduct of the parties; and that at all events, the fact should not have been suppressed.

It is proper to state, that Mr. Sutherland has declared that "Capt. Dalrymple has sworn (in his affidavit) that which is not true;" and that Lieut. M'Donnell has stated that Capt. Dalrymple was the first to use his whip on the occasion referred to.

Besides the assault on the race-course, a place (to use the words of the India Gazette,) "where the presence of the ladies ought to have prevented the slightest approach to indecorum and violence, as much as it does in the drawing-room," Mr. M. Donnell is accused of being the author of a placard highly injurious to Capt. D. Previous to this affair, Capt. Dalrymple had been called to account by Dr. Woodburn, who, about a fortnight after his arrival at Calcutta, which was early in June, deputed Mr. Nisbet of the civil service to wait upon Capt, Dalrymple, not with a hostile message, it would appear, but to intimate a wish that the affair should be brought to a crisis, and that he looked for satisfaction "if the affair was not taken notice of by government." Mr. Nisbet, after his interview with Capt. Dalrymple, seems to have intimated to Dr. Woodburn the propriety of waiting the issue of the proceedings before the government; but on the 10th July, Dr. Woodburn sent a challenge to Capt. Dalrymple, in a note left with the captain's durwan, wherein Dr. Woodburn states :-" I have good reason to think that government considers your complaint against me as groundless, or worse." This note Capt. Dalrymple forwarded to the government. Dr. Woodburn, in consequence of this implied refusal to meet him, insulted Capt. Dalrymple publicly on the course on the 15th July, upon which, Capt. Dalrymple called him out. They met, the next morning, at five o'clock; Caps. Dalrymple was attended by Capt. Hackman, and Dr. Woodburn by Mr. Deane, of the civil service. After the first fire, Mr. Barwell, the magistrate, appeared on the ground, and stopped further proceedings. Deane, however, declared to Capt. Dalrymple's second that Dr. Woodburn was not satisfied, and inquired what was further to be done? Capt. Hackman replied, that if any thing further was to take place, Mr. Deane should hear from him that day. In the course of that day Capt. Hackman (on the above remark and inquiry being repeated by Mr. Dcane) declared that, in his opinion, Capt. Dalrymple had had ample satisfaction for the insult offered him. Here the matter dropped, or rather should have dropped, for, after the affair of Mr. M'Donnell, it was revived by the publication of some statements on the subject, and by comments in the newspapers upon those statements.

We have condensed into a small compass the facts of these transactions, which are the subject of copious disquisitions in the several papers, and we have endeavoured to represent those facts accurately and impartially.

UNITARIANISM.

On Sunday last a meeting of the Unitarians of Calcutta, we understand, took place in a 100m taken for the purpose of public worship, until the building of the chapel should be finished. The Rev. Mr. Adam performed the service before a respectable and numerous congregation, and delivered a very sensible and energetic discourse on the duties of religious worship and instruction.—India Ga:, Aug. 9.

STATUE AND CENOTAPH TO THE LATE

At a meeting of the Committee for erecting a statue and cenotaph to the late Lord Hastings, held at the Town-Hall, July 18, it was resolved that application should be made to government for a suitable piece of ground in some public and conspicuous situation, on which to erect the proposed building; and also that subscriptions be solicited from Europeans and natives in the mofussil.

ENTERTAINMENT AT FUTFHGURIL.

On the 23d July, a splendid entertainment was given by the Nawaub Moontizum Ood Dowlah Hukeem Mhaindee Aly Khan, to Sir Edward and Lady Colebrooke, on the occasion of their passage through Futchgurh to Delhi, after an absence of nearly five years. The comabsence of nearly five years. pany assembled in the magnificent suite of apartments lately fitted up by the Nawaub with a degree of splendour unrivalled in the Western Provinces, and perhaps in any Court in India: and at half-past 8, the banquet was announced by the appropriate national air from the band of the 2d Extra Regiment N. I. About sixty persons sat down to a table covered with every luxury of the season; at which the hospitable lord of the palace, supported by Mr. Newnham, presided with that success which will always we trust attend on the union of the most refined Asiatic politeness with the most perfect English urbanity. It would not be easy to describe all the fascinations of the evening. After a repast, which was exhilarated by a liberal exhibition of the rarest produce of the vineyards of Champaigne and Bourdeanx, a brilliant display of fireworks called the ladies from the festive board. The pyrotechnic talents of Furkhabaud have long been distinguished; but it must be owned that the "artistes" on this occasion appeared determined to out-do those even of Vauxhall, or the Jardin de Tivoli. The area in front of the mansion was one blaze of light; but alas! there were eyes which looked on the scene, whose powers were to be rivalled by no evanescent coruscations of sulphur and saltpetre; and the unfortunate pyrotechnicians of Futeligurli, after vainly attempting to mask the battery within, by involving all without in fire and flame, were compelled to acknowledge their shame and their defeat. The ball room proclaimed the victory; and it was not till after a second summons to the hospitable board. and second libations to the rosy god, that, long after the witching hour of night, the society of Futchgurli consented to suspend those festivities which the dawn had nearly shared. - India Gaz. Aug. 9.

MILITARY PENSIONS.

We understand that a reference has been made home, by those high in authority here, regarding an alteration in the method of paying the pensions of the officers in the Hon. Company's army. The-object is said to be, to make the amount of the retiring allowance to be regulated by the length of an officer's service, rather than by the rank attained by him, at the time of his leaving the country.—John Bull, July 31.

THE LATE EMBASSY TO SIAM.

The following are the particulars of the return of the late envoy of Siam to the peninsula of Malacca. After the arrival of the party at Queda, the Guardian, in consequence of adverse weather, was several days in proceeding from thence to Trang, the residence of the raja of Ligor, when finding it unsafe to enter the channel between Pulo Telibon and the mouth of the Trang river, or to lie to the west of the island, the commander proceeded to the eastward of an island named Pulo Pappan, about ten miles from the former to the west, having an excellent harbour, with nine fathoms close to the shore, and in which a vessel can be well sheltered from the S. W. monsoon. Between Telibon and Pappan lie some dangerous rocks covered at high water, and not noticed in any charts.

On the 24th, the party proceeded from the brig in some large country boats, and ascended by the evening to Khao Rachhasi or Lion Hill, about eight miles from the mouth of the river, where the rajah of Ligor is forming a new settlement. On the 26th, they paid a visit to Khooan-Tani, a village about 20 miles up the river, and reported to be the chief seat of 'the raja's maritime equipments and depot. Instead of a considerable town alive with the bustle of naval or military preparation, the place proved to be a collection of about forty straggling huts, where a few boats, mostly in a decaying condition, were drawn up under sheds, without any appearance indicating an intention of rendering them serviceable. The population consisted of about 200 Siannese and Malays, with a few poor Chinese.

The Trang river, although it has, during the spring tides, from two to three fathoms water, as far as Khooan Tani, and may be ascended several miles higher in small boats, is a stream of difficult and dangerous access. It is full of shoals, with several large islands, and intricate channels towards the mouth, at the bar, which cannot be crossed by large boats except at high water. It is further unapproachable, at low water, to boats of any burthen, from the south, as a reef runs between the south end of Tehbon and the main, and to the northward, the channel is narrow, and the navigation unsafe for large ships. The place was known to early English traders as Tiang, but of late years has been little frequented a few clephants, rice, and a little tin, have been exported eccasionally to the Coromandel coast, by the raja of Ligor. The place, however, is not desti-tute of resources. The neighbourhood abounds in tin ore, and the forests are full of the black wood known as Siam wood, and of a species of fustic, yielding an excellent dye. Khooan Tani is not more than five days journey by land from Ligor, across the peninsula.

The family and relations of the ex-King of Queda, with their followers, and the persons, had been set at liberty by the raja of Ligor's son, and forwarded to Pinang by Capt. Burney.

The ratified copy of the treaty sent from Bengal would be conveyed by the raja of Ligor to Bangkok, and it was expected that a deputation from the Siamese government would be sent to India, to cultivate the friendly intercourse which is now established between the two powers.

After quitting Trang, the Guardian proceeded with Capt. Burney to Tavay.

From Siam we learn, that the Prahkhlang, or minister for commercial affairs, was about to be raised to the post of Chakri, or prime minister, the present minister being about to retire on a pension. This devation is in consequence of the satisfaction afforded in his conduct of the treaty with Capt. Burney, and he had latterly further propititated the royal favour by presenting to the king an elephant belonging to him, which had grown white. His brother Pya Si-phad was to succeed him as Prah khlang.—Gov. Gazette, July 19.

BOOTY AT BHURTPORE.

The newspapers here some time ago exhibited some discussion respecting the treasure found at Bhurtpore. There will now be an end (if there was not before this) to all doubts upon the subject, as communications have, we understand, been received in a high quarter here, stating that the treasure had been recognized as fair prize by the proper authorities at home, and giving instructions, we believe, for its general charge and distribution.—
Indua Gaz., Aug. 2.

BURNING OF WIDOWS.

The following jew d'esprit would be more relished if it were not on a topic much too serious for mirth.

To the Editor of the India Gazette.

I have recently seen, Mr. Editor, in some of the papers, that a meeting has been held at the city of York, to consider on the best means of abolishing the inhuman practice of burning widows in India; that it was then shewn that this practice was contrary to the precepts of our sacred books, and that it was unanimously agreed upon to petition parliament for its abolition.

It is delightful to philosophic minds to observe the universal influence which philanthropy now exercises throughout the world. While the gentlemen of the city of York and its vicinity are anxiously labouring for the well-being of their Hindoo fellow-subjects, these last are not less strenuously occupied in endeavours to better the condition of their English brethren, in those points wherein they conceive their superior information enables them usefully to suggest measures to the council of the nation. Your readers will, I doubt not, be delighted to hear that a petition to the Honourable Company of Parliament was recently drawn up and approved of by a meeting of the most eminent Bramins, merchants, and other inhabitants of the Holy City of Benares ; its object being to entreat that parliament would forthwith adopt measures to abolish the dreadful practice (which prevails in the highest degree in the neighbourhood of the city of York) of shooting poachers; a practice which was clearly shewn, to the full satisfaction of the meeting, to be contrary to the sacred books of the humane English nation.

By the wreck of my boat I have lost the notes taken at the assembly; but I remember well, that though some persons attempted to prove that amongst the English shooting their fellow-creatures was a religious obligation, since prayer and thanksgiving always preceded and followed any considerable sacrifice of this kind; that in this country they had shot in a few years many lacs of us natives; shot other Europeans, and even shot themselves; that others again asserted, that poachers were a sort of Pindarries; and others, that 'poach' was a sort of village diversion, in which people were sometimes shot by accident; yet all these objections were over-ruled, and the following resolutions unanimously passed:—

1. That this meeting views with the utmost horror the inhuman custom of shooting poachers, so prevalent in many parts of England.

- 2. That it is highly expedient that a petition be forthwith forwarded to the Honourable Company of Parliament, urging the necessity of the total abolition of this insane custom, and the condign punishment of all persons abetting therein.

  3. That this meeting is in possession of
- facts which they offer to produce, and they pledge themselves fully to prove this before parliament, that many English Bramins are concerned in these horrid sacrifices. And that it is thus incumbent on government to investigate it closely, that the Divine wrath may be thus averted from us and our children; the more especially, as this practice is utterly repugnant to the English Shastras.
- 4. That a committee be appointed to prepare the petition, and that signatures in favour of the unhappy poachers be received without distinction of castes. The committee to be also empowered to receive and expend any sums of money which may be subscribed towards putting down this dreadful and inhuman practice.—

Your's, &c. &c. Poreenashok Rov. 17th June, 1827.

INSOLVENT DEBTORS.

The answer of the government to the petition of the debtors in the Calcutta gaol, contains the following paragraph: it is addressed to Mr. Palmer and the other members of the committee of gentlemen who transmitted the petition.

" Deeply commiscrating the situation of those debtors who have been confined in gaol for a considerable period, without any prospect of obtaining their liberty, his lordship in council has felt an anxious desire to grant, with the concurrence of the supreme court, the prayer of the petitions, by extending to Calcutta the spirit of the laws in force in England for the relief of insolvent debtors. On a full consideration, however, of the question, his lordship in council regrets to find that it is not practicable to cuact a local regulation, which, while it protected the debtor against indefinite confinement, would at the same time secure the just claims of the creditor from infringement.

"The Vice-president in council deems it unnecessary to enter more fully into an explanation of the difficulties which have precluded him from complying with the prayer of the petition; but I am directed to acquaint you, for the information of the petitioners, that their petition, together with the paper signed by a large body of the inhabitants of Calcutta in support of it, will be transmitted to the Honourable Court of Directors, with the earnest request of this government, that the Honourable Court will take it into their favourable consideration, and adopt such measures as in their judgment may be best calculated to relieve the petitioners from the hardships to which they are at present subjected.

"It will be satisfactory to the petitioners to know also, as intimated to Mr. Palmer in my note of the 5th instant, that the attention of the judges of the supreme court was, some time ago, directed to this subject by the Rt. Hon. the President of the Board of Commissioners for the Affairs of India, and that it is the intention of the judges to send home, in course of the present year, some documents, accompanied by a recommendation that a bill for the relief of insolvent debtors in India should be laid before parliament.

INDIA BEFR.

We learn from the India Gazette, that in consequence of the exorbitant price which English beer has attained at Calcutta, a patent composition from England, made of "malt and hops only," has been sent out thither, whereby water may be converted into excellent beer, by mixing from one pound and upwards of the portable preparative with a gallon of water. The price from the watchouse is 8d, per pound. It is now under trial.

THE CHOLERA MORBUS.

The native papers have given us a notion of the extent to which the cholera prevailed this year in Rajpootana, and the devastation committed by it at Jaypur; but we were not before aware of its wide and wasting ravages in districts nearer to the eastern provinces. By letters from Jubulpore, we learn that the whole tract from Rewa thither has been equally afflicted; and that on a march made from Sagor to Jubulpore, not a day passed without encountering large villages wholly deserted, the survivors having fled from the pestilence which had left but few to effect their escape. In former attacks, the natives remark, women and children were scarcely ever affected; but on the present occasion, neither sex nor age has afforded any exemption. The ravages of the choler i were greatest during the latter prevalence of the hot winds: its virulence was checked by the first showers of rain, and, at the date of our letters, the latter part of July, had wholly disappeared. According to native superstition, the severity of this malady of late years has originated in the necessity to which the goddess Kali has been subjected to obtain human victins, through the agency of disease, since she has been deprived of those sources of supply which civil war and Pindaree inroads afforded.—Cal. Gov. Gaz. Aug. 2.

FEMALE LDUCATION.

The Third Report of the Ladies' Society for Native Female Education presents, on the whole, an encouraging prospect, and holds out inducements to the friends and supporters of the institution to persevere in the good work which they have undertaken. They have, however, to regret the loss of the services of Mrs. Perowne, of Burdwan, who, from the bad state of her busband's health, has been obliged to proceed to Eng. land along with him. For this reason, nine of the twelve schools at this station have been shut up. To compensate, in some degree, for the loss which the interests of native female education have sustained by the departure of this lady, a school has been opened at Tallygunge, under the patronage of the society, and three have been commenced at other stations, by benevolent individuals, to which it is hoped that the aid of the society will be extended; they are at present supported by private benevolence alone. The number of scholars at the different schools in Calcutta is about the same as last year, viz. 600; of these about 400 are in daily attendance, and the progress which they have made, by the accounts of their appearance at the public examination, seems to have been most satisfactory. One of the most interesting of the pupils is a blind girl, who has made great advances in learning, and is one of the most forward The ordinary subscriptions and donations have this year fallen short of what they were last year, by 4876 sicca rupees. The Central School, of which the foundation was laid in May 1826, is now nearly finished, and with a view of inducing the scholars to meet together in greater numbers, and to accustom them to come from a farther distance for instruction, previous to the new building being opened, Mrs. Wilson has begun to assemble the pupils of several schools in one place, near the site of this structure. a proof of the improved feelings of the natives in regard to the education of their female children, we may mention that they begin to allow them to remain to a much later age with their instructors. At Burdwan, we observe it stated, that several girls of fourteen or fifteen were in daily attendance, and it was now nothing unusual Asiatre Journ. Vol.25. No.146.

with them to continue even after they were betrothed.—Cal. John Bull, July 17.

The Gov. Gazette, with reference to this subject, remarks: "The advance made under this mode of tuition, and the number of scholars attending the schools where it prevails, are circumstances worthy of re-They indicate a growing indifference to native belief, and augmenting desire to acquire instruction. It can scarcely be doubted that the result will be beneficial, as whatever awakens the intellect must elevate the moral character of every class of society; but whether more good might not be effected under a different course of instruction, will be determined according to the different notions of different individuals. We should strongly impress, however, upon the society, the advantage of not attempting too much. A number of schools, attended by hundreds of scholars, bears with it splendid promise; but those who are familiar with the subject, find in such announcement cause of doubt and suspicion. In proportion to the number and extent of the schools is the difficulty, or we may say, the impossibility, of efficient superintendence, a requisite which is as rare in this country as it is indispensable. One school well managed is worth fifty left to incompetent teachers; and fifty scholars, well taught, are a much more valuable product than five hundred parroted to repeat what they do not comprehend.

CIVIL SERVICE ANNUITY FUND.

A special general meeting of the subscribers to this Finnd was held at the Town Hall on the 26th June; Mr. R. Walpole in the chair. The meeting was called at the requisition of a certain number of subscribers, "for the purpose of taking into consideration the expediency and propriety of taking measures for the eventual appropriation of the surplus funds of the institution, arising from the small number of annuities annually taken by members of the service entitled thereto, in ease of such surplus being hereafter found to accrue."

Few of the requisitionists being present, and those who were in attendance having no specific proposition to submit, Mr. Udny, the acting secretary, informed the meeting that he had received a letter from Mr. A. Ross, one of the requisitionists, addressed to the chairman, containing proposals which that gentleman wished to be laid before the meeting. The letter was read, and contained the following proposition:—

"The Civil Annuity Fund was established in the expectation that it would accelerate promotion in the service, by inducing some of the senior servants to retire annually. It has not hitherto, however, produced the expected effect, nor is trop-2 M bable bable that it ever will, if it continue on its present footing; as an annuity of little more than £500 (which is the real value granted by the fund), can at no time be sufficient to induce the retirement of servants holding the highest offices under the government, and in the receipt of large salaries. Taking this view of the institution, and thinking a modification of the existing rules necessary to render it effective, I am induced to propose as follows:

"That the number of the members of the institution qualified to become annuitants be enlarged, by reducing the qualifying period of service to twenty years, including a furlough of three years.

"That if in any year the number of members desirous of retiring from the service fall short of the number of annuities claimable, the sum of money appropriable from the funds of the institution towards providing for the annulties not claimed, be added to the sum appropriable towards the provision of thenine additional annuities claimable on account of the fol- lowing year; and in the event of the aggregate of these sums being more than sufficient to provide for an annuity of £1,000, on the terms prescribed by the existing rules of the institution, to each of the members retiring in such following year, that the surplus be divided among those members, either in money, or in the shape of increased annuities, as may be preferred by them."

This proposition was unanimously negatived.

Mr. Udny then laid before the meeting a letter from Patna and its adjacent zillahs, signed by nineteen members of the service, containing proposals, in substance, as follows—

"That in the event of any surplus being found to arise from the non-appropriation of annuities, or from the interest arising therefrom, such portion of the amount so accruing, as may be required for the purpose, shall be appropriated, first to the annuitants, by an anticipation of the period when the annuities are made payable in modification of the 5th rule of the institution; and secondly, by providing the difference of value from the payments being made half yearly, or quarterly.

"That in the event of the above principle being adopted, the resolution be submitted to the service at large, with a view to a final determination being taken at the next annual general meeting, preparatory to an application to the Court of Directors, in the usual form."

After some discussion regarding the proposals contained in the above letter, Mr. Molony, seconded by Mr. H. Lushington, moved as an amendment,—

"That it is the opinion of this meeting, that, although the full number of pensions contemplated by the Honourable Court of Directors, to be taken annually, has not hitherto been accepted, the experience of two years only is insufficient to justify the conclusion that the aggregate number of pensions which will fall due at the end of five or ten years, or any other given period during the last twenty-five years of the fund, will not be demanded.

fund, will not be demanded.
"That, as it appears from legal advice taken by the managers, that the pensions applied for in one year, may be assigned from the unappropriated pensions of preceding years, so far as they will go, it is possible, that after the fund has been a few years longer in operation, the number of applicants will be sufficiently large to absorb all the unappropriated pensions of preceding years; and that, under the pos-sibility of such a contingency, any proposition having for its object the appropriation of the surplus funds now existing, either by increasing the scale of pensious, or in any other manner not provided for by the rules at present in force, is premature and inexpedient."

Mr. Paxton here requested permission to read the 63d para. of the Honourable Count's despatch, by which, he was opinion, the contingency of a surplus was provided for; after which, the above amendment was put to the vote, and carried by a large majority.

Mr. Dampier then remarked, that in consequence of the indistinct manner in which the objects for which the meeting had been called were set forth in the notice published in the Government Gazette, and the consequent inability of the service at large to ascertain what modifications of the present system were in contemplation, he considered it his duty to move, that "no resolution of this meeting shall be considered final, till it has been circulated for the consideration of the service at large, and has received the approbation of the prescribed majority. The motion being seconded by Mr. H. T. Prinsep, was put to the sense of the meeting, and carried by a large majority.

THE GOVERNOR GENERAL.

Private letters of the 25th of last month, from Meerut, give the following particulars of the visit of the Right Honourable the Governor-general to that station. His lordship and family arrived at Meerut on the 2d of July, having travelled dawk from Sabathoo, via Kurnaul. The cholera morbus had been raging with fatal effect in the tract of country through, which his lordship and family passed, but we are happy to add that they reached Meerut in perfect health. The hot winds continued uninterruptedly till the 23d, when the heat was relieved by gentle showers of rain. On the 9th instant the officers of the 16th Lancers entertained his lordship and family at a ball and supper, and on the 23d a similar entertainment was given by the Governor-general to the residents of Meerut and Hawpur. The gaieties passed off with equal success. On the 27th the new theatre will be opened under the auspices of the Governor-general, with the "Honey-Moon;" and, in consequence of the early departure of his lordship, the "Heir at Law" will be got up for the 31st. On the evening of the 2d of August, his lordship and family will leave Meerut for Gurmuktesir Ghat, to embark for Futeghur and Calcutta.—Cal. Gov. Gaz., August 13.

The Governor-general, we are informed, intended to give audience to the Native Chieftains on his route to the presidency; which circumstances would detain his lordship a little longer than was expected. The Rewali chieftains were to pay their respects to his lordship at Murzapore.—Mad. Gov. Gaz., Aug. 28.

TIBETIAN LITERATURE.

By letters from Nepal of the 27th ultimo, we learn, that the Mission which leaves Kathmandu for China every five years, was on the point of setting out, and that hopes were entertained of procuring, by the aid of some of the principal persons composing it, valuable accessions to our knowledge of the literature of Tibet. — Cal. Gov. Gaz., July 30.

SELF-INHUMATION.

The Jams Jehan Numa, a native Bengal paper, reports from Jeypore, that "an old Baiagi, above a hundred years of age, the head of an establishment, had assembled about seven or eight thousand mendicants of his order, whom he fed for two days: on the third, he dug a pit, in which he placed the seat of his predecessor, and delivering over his own pillow to his spiritual successor, Sivanath, he announced, in a loud voice, that this year would be agitated by public calamities, and then entering the pit, the Bairagis present, by his desire, buried him alive."

TRANSMISSION OF NEWSPAPERS.

A notice from the General Post-Office at Calcutta, dated 7th July, announces that "English newspapers imported into this office, having previously passed through his Majesty's General Post-Office in Great Britain, will be exempted from any charge on account of ship-postage. This rule will not apply to such as may be received through any other channel, nor will it in any way interfere with the rates of inland postage now collected on English newspapers."

INDIGO CROP.

The Madras Gazette of August 28th states that letters had been received from the interior, which stated that the indigo crop about Cawnpore is not turning out so well as was expected, production being rather below an average.

ACCIDENTS.

A letter from Ghazeepore, in one of the papers, states that in a violent hurricane off Bheerpore, about six miles above Buxar, on the 22d of April, five boats of a fleet, with a detachment of his Majesty's troops, under Capt. Piper, of his Majesty's 58th regiment, were swamped, and Ensign Hays, of the 38th, was drowned, with several followers.

On the 28th of May, Mr. Assistant Surgeon Heath left Chinsurah in the steam-boat for Barrackpore, whence, after breakfasting there, he proceeded in a dinghy to Calcutta, and in crossing over from Howiah to Chandpaul Ghaut, between 2 and 3 r. M., a squall upset the boat, and he was lost, together with the manife and two dandies. Mr. Heath was a young man, only lately arrived in India, and was much esteened.

THE AFGHAN INSURRECTION.

The native papers contain the following particulars relating to the insurrection of the Afghan Musalmans against the Sikhs:—

Advices from Caubul to the first of June, give reason to expect that the disturbances are about to be suppressed by the dispersion of the rebels. One of the leaders, Nur al din, with about 5,000 men, applied to Yar Mohammed Klian, the late governor of Peshawer, for pecuniary aid; but was told by him that he could not help himself, much less give assistance to others; upon which he marched off towards Khairabad, where the governor will, no doubt, soon give a good account of him. It is not known what has become of Maulavi Ibrahim and Maulavi Abdul Hy. About 200 of the men of Naushereh, who had been attached to the party of the Mauvali returned to their homes, and upon expressing their contrition, and paying a fine of five rupees each, were allowed to resume their usual occupations. Budh Sing, with the Sikh army, was master of the country. Shaker Ali, the chief of the Yusef Zeis, had come into camp with letters from Dost Mohammed Khan and Prince Kamian, and been dismissed with a dress of honour. Thirty Sirdars of Caubul had paid the money demanded of them, and received complimentary dresses. Habib Allah Klıan, the son of the late Mohammed Azim Khan, and the chief cause of the subversion of the Afghan state, had an interview with Budh Sing, and been similarly invested. Terms had in fact been settled with Dost Mohammed hammed Khan, and the army only remained until he had made good the stipulated payments. The battalions of the French officers had been directed by Budh Sinh to return to Lahore, and the rest of the army, it was expected, would immediately follow, as soon as arrangements were completed for the regulation of the country, and collection of the revenues.

MISSION TO RUNJEET SINGH.

The following statement in the Government Gazette gives fuller details than the report in our last vol. p. 789:-

We have been favoured with letters from Simla of the 5th instant, and from the Punjab of the 24th and 30th ultimo, as well as the akhbar of the latter date, from which we have collected the following particulars of the mission to Maharaja Runjit

The complimentary mission of Dewan Mootee Ram and Fakir Imam ood din, by the Sikh chieftain to the Right Honourable the Governor-general, in the end of April, we have already noticed. His lordship considering it proper to return the compliment, sent Captain Wade, the political agent at Ludhiana, and Capt. Pearson, one of the Governor-general's aides-de-camp, with a letter and presents to the raja, escorted by a troop of the 8th Native Cavalry and a company of infantry. They crossed the Setlej on the 22d of May, and were met on entering the rajah's territory by two of his principal sirdars. The mission arrived at Jendiala on the 27th, and on its advance to Amritsir, was met about three miles from the city by the rajah's second son, Prince Shar Sinh, and the prime minister Aziz ood din, attended by 500 of the raja's select guard of Gho cherahs, splendidly dressed in yellow satin uniforms With this escort the mission proceeded to the place of encampment on the east bank of a small lake, a short distance from the Rambagh, in which the raja was encamped.

The evening of the 29th was fixed on for the public audience of the envoy, and the presentation of the Governor-general's letter. When the hour arrived, Raja Dhyan Sinh and Aziz ood din, were sent to conduct the mission from their tents. road had previously been lined on either hand by a regiment of cavalry and two battalions of infantry, who saluted as the party proceeded to the first gate of the enclosure of the Rambagh, where two pieces of artillery fired a salute of twenty rounds. The raja, clad in a white dress, and decorated with splendid jewels, was seated in the hall of audience, surrounded by his principal courtiers, all, by previous command, in their gala robes, and forming a brilliant assemblage. Richly ornamented chairs were placed for the European gentlemen. On their entering the raja rose, advanced to the edge of the carpet, and after embracing Capt. Wade, led him to his chair. After the party was scated. Runjit Sinh entered into familiar conversation with the party, inquiring after his lordship's health, and expressing his regret that his own indisposition had pre. vented his interview with the Governor, general. The Governor-general's letter was then presented, and read aloud in court by the minister. Its friendly tenor seemed to give great satisfaction to the Ma. haraia. After this the presents of the Governor-general were brought in. They consisted of elephants and horses, with their caparisons, a sabre, a gun, a pair of pistols, a telescope, and various articles of Europe manufacture, of which, the Maharaja, who rose from his seat to inspect them, expressed his great admiration, Among the presents were some from Lady Amherst to the rance, the mother of Prince Kherg Sinh, which the Maharaja engaged to present to her himself. He then sent for some of the finest horses of his stud, and explained their good qualities as they passed in review.

At the time of the visit of the mission Amritsir wore the appearance of a fortified city, and a regular force of 25,000 men was encamped round the walls. All the corps were at exercise morning and evening. The brigade of infantry, under the French officers, is described as being a remarkably fine and well disciplined body of men.

Runjit Sinh's first appearance is said not to be much in his favour, his person being small and insignificant: when he begins to speak, however, he soon becomes animated, and displays considerable shrewdness and intelligence. He is very inquisitive, and often asks ludierous questions: amongst other things, he inquired if the English deputation would eat with the French officers; whether Capt Wade spoke French; and if Capt. Pearson had learned Punjabi? After the audience broke up, and the party had taken leave, he expatiated with great vivacity, and for a considerable period, upon the intelligence and courtcous manners of the envoy.

His own court was composed of not above thirty of his principal Sirdars, besides inferior attendants; but the whole was characterized by a stately and decorous air, very different from the promiscuous and disorderly assemblage which usually constitutes an Indian durbar.

SUTTEE

The Timira Nasuk contains the following account, dated " Pateala:"-A woman of the Khetri caste having determined to burn herself with her husband, who had fallen a victim to the epidemic, the officers of the raja prevented her. She exclaimed loudly against this interference, and declared that she had burnt herself four times with her husband in former existences, and that if she was not hindered the fifth time, the cholera would cease in a fortnight: on hearing this, the raja ordered that she should be allowed to burn herself.

INTEREST ON TREASURY NOTES.

Territorial Department, the 26th July, 1827 .- Notice is hereby given, that the sub-treasurer will no longer issue treasury notes, bearing interest at 5 per cent. per annum, but in lieu thereof, will hereafter issue to all persons desirous of receiving the same in payment of demands against the government, or otherwise, treasury notes bearing a daily interest of two and a half per cent., payable on notice of 30 days, to be given in the Government Gazette. The said notes will be receivable into the loan at par, and in liquidation of all demands of Government at the general treasury, as well as in pay-ments on account of salt, opium, and customs, at this presidency: provided, however, that notes shall not be issued for sums less than 500 rupees, nor otherwise than in sums of even hundreds.

SHIPPING.

Airivals in the River.

Arrivals in the River.

July 21. Madebne, Coghlan, from Bourbon.—
23. Betenmar, Gonsalvas, from Bombay, Ceylon, and Madras.—Aug. 1. Mavia, Strong, from Cape of Good Hope.—2. Ocean, Serle, from New York.

—4. Robburgh Castle, Denny, from London and Madras, and (rounn, Plinder, from Liverpool.—12. Ospaty, M'Gill, from London; Betzmit, Talbert, from London; Cambridge, Barber, from Penang, Ann. Adler, from Isle of France, and Izelmond, Busul, from Bourbon and Madras.—12. Potector, Waugh, from London and Madras, and Millind, Jackson, from Bombay.—13. George, Fukher, from London, Cape, and Madras.—14. Natlend Pagel, Geary, from London and Madras.—16. Salton, Milchell, from Perstan Gulf, Bombay, and Madras.—17. Ann., Cattell, from Cape and Madras.

Departures from Calcutta.

July 21. Krnt, Craw, for Cape of Good Hope.

—3s. Indum Onle, Rekl, for Isle of France.—Aug.
In. Capter, Stephen, for Batavia; and M'Cauly.
Aken, for Madras.—13. Fesper, Wyllic, for Dondonla and Duent Clarker, Viles, for Isle of France.—17. James Subbald, Forbes, for Madras.

Gone to Sea.

July B. Remitse, Gribble, for China.—11. Here-foodshar, Whiteman, for China.—25. Duke of July, Locks, and Buckinghumshire, Laucaster, both for China.—Aug. 20. Funsattar, Dalrymple, and Fundam, Proctor, both for China.—24. Lugdis, Serle, and Scaleby Castle, Newall, both for China.

Passengers for Europe, via China.

Per Repulsa: The Hon. J. H. Harington, Esq., activil servant on this establishment; Mrs. Harington; Mrs. P. H. Taylor; Mrs. Nixon; Ens. J. G. Ellis, 60th N. I.,—also Misses C. Harington, A. Harington, E. C. Taylor, C. A. Taylor, and A. M. Taylor, children.

Per Buckinghamshire: Capt. W. Cockell, H.M.'s 2d or Queen's Royals; Mr. H. T. Goode.

BIRTHS.

May 23. At Cawnpore, the lady of Lieut. R. Chitty, 4th N.I., of a daughter.
25. At Meerut, the lady of Capt. Monteath,

25. At Meerut, the lady of Capt. Monteatn, 35th N.I., of a sone... June 1. At Kamptee, the lady of Major J. F. Gibson, commanding 2d Europ. regt., of a daugh-

20. At Cawnpore Farm, Mrs. W. Dickson, of a

24. Chowringhee, Mrs. J. Madge, jun., of a daughter.

At Chowringhee, Mrs. J. Mauge, jum, daughter.

At Indore, the lady of Capt. Danger del, sasistant optum agent, of a son.

— Mrs. Willick, wife of Mr. Jos. Willick, of the ship Jangeer, of a daughter. Jos. Willick, of the ship Jangeer, of a daughter.

B. At Lucknow, the lady of Lieut. G. N. Prole,
3d N.I., of a still-born son.

9. At Lohooghat, in Kemaoun, the lady of Lieut. Col. John Delamain, 58th N.I., of a son.

— The lady of Capt. Eastgate, of a daughter.
10. At Peeprah, Purneah, Mrs. J. Smith, of a daughter.

At Peeprah, Purneah, Mrs. J. Smith, of a daughter.
 At Bhopalpore, the lady of Lieut. and Qu. Mast. Griffin, 24th N.I., of a son.
 Mrs. J. Sinclair, of a son.
 Mrs. T. Burke, of a daughter.
 Mis. W. Stocker, of a son.
 At Allipore, the lady of C. R. Barwell, Esq.,

of a daughter.

19. At Hauper, near Meerut, the lady of Capt. Alex. Carnegy, of a daughter.
20. At Serampore, Mrs. N. J. Gantzer, of a

21. The wife of Mr. Joseph Burridge, H. C.'s

21. The wife of Mr. Joseph Burridge, H. C.'s marine, of a son.
22. The lady of Lieut. Col. Bryant, judge advocate general, of a daughter.
23. At Nagnore, the lady of Capt. F. W. Hands, 38th Madras NI., of a son.
— The lady of J. R. Martin, isq., of a son.
24. At Mozufferpore, Tyrhoot, the lady of Thos. T. Dashwood, Esq., C. S., of a daughter.
— Mrs. W.G. Grieff, of a daughter.
— 26. At Dacca, the lady of Lieut. J. B. Robinson, 61st NI., of a daughter.
— At Chowringhee, the lady of Capt. C. T. G. Weston, of a daughter.
27. At Benares, the lady of Capt. A. Dick, 62d NI., of a son.

N.I., of a son.

N.I., of a son.

— At Delhi, the lady of J. A. D. Watson, Esq., surgeon, 17th N.I., of a son.

— Mrs. M. Balthaser, of a daughter.
21. At Allahabad, Mrs. M. A. Triepland, of a son At Meerut, the lady of Maj. King, 16th Lancers, of a daughter.

31. At Bishop's College, the lady of Professor

At Diships Concept the any of Asson.

Aug. I. Mrs. J. L. Dunnett, of ason.

2. At Barrackpore, the lady of Lieut. J. Ferris, 26th N.I., of a son.

— At Futtyghur, Mrs. M. S. Hennessey, of a son and heir.

Mrs. Cook of a daughter.

son and heir.

— Mrs. Cook, of a daughter.

4. At Kishnaghur, the lady of Adam Ogilvie, Esq., civil service, of a son.

— Mrs. C. C. Aratoon, of a son.

7. Mrs. T. Henson, of a son.

9. At Kidderpore, the lady of W. H. L. Hind, Esq., of a daughter.

10. L. He lady of the Rev. Francis Goode, of a

Mrs. F. G. Stacy, of a son.

— Mrs. F. G. Stacy, of a son.

— At Chanderdagore, Mrs. M. Nicholas, of a daugner.

11. At Burdwan, the lady of David Scott, Esq., jun., of the civil service, of a son.

At Berhampore, the lady of Lieut. J. A. Fairhead, adj., Moorsheddad Prov. Bat., of a 12. Mrs. C. Warden, of a daughter.

Mrs. M. Paul, of a daughter.

The lady of T. B. Swinhoe, Esq., of # daughter. — Mrs. John Brown, of a still-born child.

MARRIAGES.

July 2. At Cawmpore, Lieut. Arch. McKean, 42d N.I., to Miss Anderson.
9. At Cawmpore, Mr. Assist. Apothecary D. W. Taylor, to Miss C. Massey.
10. At Arch, district of Shahabad, Mr. A. D'Abreo, to Miss H. Miller.

16. At Agra, Mr. H. G. Leopold, to Miss M.

Williams.

20. At the Cathedral, Mr. E. T. Power, H.C.'s marine, to Miss Jane Perie.

21. At the Cathedral, Capt. T. Hanold, country service, to Mrs. Eliz. Campbell, widow of the late Capt. D. Campbell.

23. At the Cathedral, Lieut. Wood, 25th N.L., to Miss F. H. Dona.

24. Mr. A. Gregory, to Miss L. Isaac.

25. At Cawapore, Major N. Brutton, H.M.'s Ilth Light Drags, to Mrs. Rozalie Quelvios, relict of the late Jos. Quelros, Eq., of Lucknow.

— Lieut. and Adj. F. Asson, 18th N.I., third son of Lieut. Gem. Sir George Anson, K.C.B., to Miss Catherine Hanson.

Miss Catherine Hanson.

27. At Ramnaghur, J. C. Sage, Esq., 4th Extra Regt., to Elizabeth, youngest daughter of the late N. Rabcholm, Esq., of his Danish Majesty's late N. Rabenoum, Esq., v. 18.

1401 Service.

30. Mr. H. Webster, to Miss M. D'Cruz.

1402. 2. At Dacca, John O'Dwyer, Esq., assist.

1502 Service.

1503 Service.

1504 Service.

1505 Service.

1505 Service.

1505 Service.

1506 Service.

1506 Service.

1507 S royal navy.

DEATHS.

June 4. At Cawnpore, Maria Jane, wife of Lleut. R. Chitty, 4th N.I.
12. At Dinapore, A. Cooke, Esq., surgeon, 67th

Mr. J. A. Oliveira, a native of Portugal, aged 36 14. At Ramnad, Helen, daughter of the late M.

14. At Ramnad, Helen, daughter of the late M. Christy. Esq., fornerly on the medical establishment of this president, aged 17.
17. At Sulkea, Mr. Joseph Gibb, aged 26.
19. At Nusserabad, in Rappootane, W. A. Edmonstone, Esq., assistant to the superintendant and political agent of Ajmer, aged 23.
20. Thomas Thomson, Esq., indigo planter, aged 23.
21. At Kurnal, the lady of Capt. Gillespie.
— At Chandernagore, Mr. O. Andrews, second assistant to the judge and magistrate of that place, aged 23.

aged 25.

Mr. John Grimwood, mate in the H.C.'s marine, aged 27.

22. Charles Blaney, Esq., merchant and agent,

aged 52.

— Capt. T. Fyfe, commander of the brig Isubella, aged 45.

— At Howrah, Master W. Beauchamp, aged years.

23. At Humeerpore, the lady of A. W. Begble, Esq., of the civil service.

At Purneah, J. V. Biscoe, Esq., of the civil service, aged 34.

— Mr. C. C. Cooper, second mate II.C.'s marine

Mr. C. C. Cooper, second many aged 27.
 Mr. W. Collier, captam's steward of the ship David Scatt, aged 29.
 Mr. J. C. Hughes, assistant in the marine pay office, aged 28.

24. Master W. R. Black, only son of Mr. A.

24, Master W. R. Diack, only Son or Millack, aged years.
28. Mr. E. D. R. A. Crickett, midshipman of the ship David Scott, aged 19.
— Mr. J. Bayliss, boat office keeper, aged 36.
29. At Dun-Dun, Mr. G. Rowland, head assistant riding master of the horse artillery depôt, sistant riding master of the horse artillery depôt, aged 27.

31. Joseph Ives, Esq., deputy register of the general department, aged 52.

Ang. 1. Mrs. Eliz. Grieff, wife of Mr. W. G. Grieff, aged 52.

As a t Fendat Baug, the Rev. S. Trawin, missionary from the London Missionary Society.

7. At the great gaol of Calcutta, Mrs. Mary Moore, the wife of Mr. Robert Moore, who has been imprisoned for debt for upwards of twelve years.

8. Mrs. Shakur, wife of M. S. Shakur, Esq., aged 37.

9. Mr. Jas. Burt, son of the late Dr. Adam

9. Mr. Jas. Burt, son or the late Law James Burt, aged 27,
11. M. C. Radcliffe, Faq., aged 30.
13. Mr.a. M. A. Grimwood, late assistant at the Military Lower Orphan School, aged 44.
Lately. At Colindon, near Juanpore, James Ferrier, Esq., indigo planter, aged 40.

Madras.

GOVERNMENT GENERAL ORDERS.

REWARDS TO NATIVE OFFICERS.

Fort St. George, May 15, 1827 .- His Exc. the commander-in-chief having brought to the notice of Government the undermentioned native officers, who have in a special manner distinguished themselves by their gallant and soldier-like conduct throughout the late war in Ava. the Honourable the Governor in Council has great satisfaction in expressing his approbation of their services, and in conferring upon them the rewards specified to their names respectively.

1st Class .- Subadar Major Mudden. sing, 9th N.I., and Subadar Major Syed Abdullah, 38th ditto-each a sword and a palankeen, with an allowance of Rs. 70 monthly for the support of that equipage, and half-pay to his nearest heir after his decease.

2d Class. - Subadar Rungiah, 28th N.I., and Subadar Maliomed Cassim, ditto ditto-each a palankeen, with an allowance of Rs. 70 monthly for the sunport of that equipage, and half-pay to his nearest heir after his decease.

3d Class. - Subadar Abdull Nubby, 18th N.I., Subadar Mahomed Hussain, 38th ditto; and Subadar Mahomed Galleb, 38th ditto-each a palankeen, with an allowance of Rs. 70 monthly for the support of that equipage,

To mark the high sense which the Goverument entertain of the indefatigable exertions of the corps of pioneers throughout the war in Ava. the Hon, the Governor in Council is pleased to resolve, as a special case, that Jemidar Andoo, of that corps, whose gallant conduct has been particularly brought to notice, shall be promoted to the rank of subadar, that he be presented with a palankeen, and an allowance of Rs. 70 monthly for the support of that equipage, and that a pension of half-pay be granted to his pearest heir after his decease.

VACATION OF STAFF OFFICES.

Fort St. George, May 25, 1827.—The Hon, the Governor in Council has been pleased to resolve that the following alterations shall be made in the regulations published in G. O. under date the 23d Dec. 1823, regarding the rank of which certain staff offices are to be vacated.

Director of artillery depôt of instruction-no limitation.

Assist. Adj. General and Assist. Quarter Master General of a field or subsidiary force; Superintending Officer of Gentlemen Cadets; Secretary to the College and Board of Public Instruction; Translators to Courts or Commissions; Deputy Sccretary to the Military Board; and Deputy Judge Advocate General—to be vacated on promotion to the rank of lieut. col. regimentally.

Cantonment Adjutant at Palaveram to be vacated on promotion to the rank of major regimentally.

REGULATIONS FOR CONDUCTING COURTS-MARTIAL.

Head-Quarters, May 25, 1827.—Taking into consideration the imperfect and inefficient supervision at present existing with respect to regimental and other courts-martial inferior to general, whereupon, nevertheless, the army at large is principally dependant for the administration of justice and the support of its discipline, and with a view to ensuring to such courts a greater regularity in their conduct, and a strict adherence therein to the law of evidence, his Exc. the commander-inchief is pleased to establish the following regulations.

- 1. Officers, upon confirming, or otherwise, the proceedings of regimental or other courts-martial inferior to general, assembled by their authority, will immediately forward such (original) proceedings to the commanding officer of the division, detachment, or field force, who will refer them for examination to the deputy judge advocate general of the division.
- 2. It will be the special duty of the deputy judge advocate to examine carefully and minutely all such proceedings, noting that all forms have therein been strictly observed, that the law of evidence has been adhered to, and that the finding and sentence are legal and apposite; and, in the event of any irregularity or illegality, to communicate his opinion thereupon to the commanding officer, who will duly notice it to the officer by whose authority the court was assembled. The deputy judge advocate general will also forward a duplicate of his opinion and report to the judge advocate general of the army for the commander-in-chief's information.
- 3 It will be in the discretion of divisional commanding officers to take such measures as may be requisite for the future avoidance of similar irregularities or illegalities in like cases. §
- The original proceedings of all such courts-martial shall, after examination, be returned by the deputy judge advocate general, as records, to the garrison or regimental officers to which they may belong.
- 5. The proceedings of all regimental or other courts-martial inferior to general, shall be uniformly and fairly made out, without erasure, upon foolscap paper, with a margin of one inch in addition to the usual margin for the rubric, in order that they may be bound in half-yearly volumes, and thereby afford greater facility of reference and certainty of their preservation.

- 6. In field forces or special commands unattached to any division to which there may not be any deputy judge advocate general appointed, it shall be the duty of the assistant adjutant general or brigade major generally to provide for the due observance of these regulations, under the authority of the 'commanding officer of such force.
- 7. The provisions of this order are solely and specially intended to produce future regularity by bringing past irregularity to notice and animadversion; and it is expressly to be understood that they are not in any instance to authorize the delay of the infliction of punishments awarded by courts-martial, or to remove the responsibility of officers approving the sentences of such; which punishments will be carried into prompt execution, and which responsibility will continue to exist as heretofore.

Head-Quarters, May 28.—It is hereby directed that whensoever charges may hereafter be preferred against any native officer or soldier in the service, a certified translation thereof shall be prepared without delay, and the same read and delivered to the prisoner in the presence of the commanding officer of the regiment, station, detachment, or guard, as the case may be.

Head-Quarters, June 16.—The Commander-in-chief directs that no sentence by any court-martial, European or native, inferior to general, shall be inflicted beyond 300 lashes.

Head-Quarters, July 24.—The practice of awarding, by sentence of a court-martial, a certain number of lashes to be inflicted in a divided manner in different places of the station, is prohibited as irregular. It is usual to leave the time and place to the approving officer, and it is altogether contrary to the present usage to inflict further punishment after a prisoner has once been taken down from the halberts.

The practice of awarding suspension to non-commissioned officers is also prolibited, that punishment being, by the articles of war, specially applied to the commissioned ranks of the army, and in no way sutable to the circumstances of the conditions of others.

The proceedings of courts-martial inferior to general will be referred to judge advocates for examination from divisions, subsidiary and field forces and stations, according to the following arrangement.

 To Capt. Ardagh—from the Nagpore subsidiary.

2. To Capt. Macarthur—from the Hyderabad subsidiary, including the light field division of that force; and the field force in the Dooab.

- s. To Capt. Highmoor from the Northern division.
- 4. To Capt. O'Brien—from the Mysore division, including the provinces; and the Ceded districts.
- 5. To Capt. Murcott—from the Centre division, and the presidency, with St. Thomas's Mount.
- 6. To Capt. Dun-from the Southern division, and the Travancore subsidiary.

LIRUT. COLONELS COMMANDANT.

Head-Quarters, June 21, 1827 .- The Commander-in-chief having observed that officers, being lieutenant-colonels-commandant of regiments, are in the habit of designating themselves and being designated lieutenant-colonel commandant on occasions of general duty; his Exc. desires it to be understood, that officers so circumstanced have no superior army rank, and that the designation only applies to their command in regiments having the authority and advantages therein of colonels, but that on all general duties they will be described in their army rank, and that the designation of commandant only applies to them when described regimentally.

VETFRINARY SURGEONS.

Fort St. George, July 6, 1827.—The Hon, the Governor in Council has been pleased to resolve, that veterinary surgeons shall be admitted at the cadet quarters on their arrival, under G.O. dated the 18th July 1820, and that they shall be entitled to the benefit of the regulations authorizing the supply of equipments to young officers proceeding from the presidency to join their corps for the first time.

LIEUT. COL. J. NOBLE.

Fort St. George, July 24, 1827.—The Hon, the Governor in Council has received with concern the report of the death of Lieut. Col. John Noble, C.B., of the artillery. He was returning to his duty on board the ship Rosburgh Castle, and died on the 16th instant, the evening before the ship anchored in Madras roads. His remains were landed and interred with military honours the following day.

Lieut. Col. Noble arrived in India in the year 1795. He was employed in the Mysore war in 1799, and was present at the fall of Seringapatam. He served in the Ceded districts when they were occupied by our troops in 1800 and 1801. He was present at the battles of Assaye and Argaum under his Grace the Duke of Wellington. He formed the corps of horse artillery in 1805. He was in the field under Colonel Close in 1810, and Colonel Doveton in the years 1815, 1816, and 1817. He commanded the horse artillery at the capture of Java in 1811. He commanded the artillery with the headquarters of the army of the Deckan, and was present at the battle of Mahidpore,

Full of professional ardour, this officer sought every opportunity of active employ. ment in the field, and had a share in almost every service of importance while he was in the army. He was early brought into public notice for his superior qualities, and honoured with the marked confidence, and through after-life with the friendship, of His Grace the Duke of Wellington. No allurements had charms for him in comparison with the calls of duty. He was beloved as much as he was admired and respected by all who served under him. He enjoyed the unlimited confidence of his superiors. He may be held up as the model of a perfect soldier; and to the Go. vernment, the army, and his own corps in particular, his death may be regarded as a public misfortune.

MILITARY FUND.

Fort St. George, July 27, 1827. - Adverting to the extract of a letter from the Hon. Court of Directors in the Military Department, dated the 30th April 1823, and published in G O. under date the 9th September following, the Hon. the Governor in Council desires it may be distinctly understood, that no individual admitted a member of the Military Fund, subsequently to the publication of the Honourable Court's letter abovementioned, shall have the option of withdraw. ing from the institution, but shall continue his regulated contribution thereto, so long as he may remain in the service; and all paymasters or others by whom the pay and allowances of officers or chaplains may be discharged, are hereby ordered and directed to make the requisite stoppages from the abstracts of subscribers, according to the information which they may receive from the secretary of the Fund.

DATE OF PROMOTION OF CADETS.

Fort St. George, Aug. 3, 1827 .- Under instructions from the Honourable the Court of Directors, the Hon. the Governor in Council resolves, that the following principle for regulating the date of promotion of cadets to the rank of cornet and ensign respectively shall be adopted, viz. that the date shall correspond with that of the departure of the individual from England, if at that period there should be a vacancy in the rank of cornet or ensign in the army; and if there should not be a vacancy, the date shall correspond with that of the first casualty occasioning a vacancy after the cadet left England, provided the circumstance be known on his arrival, or previously to his being permanently posted to a regiment.

ASSISTANT SURGEONS.

Fort St. George, Aug. 13, 1827 .- Assistant surgeons who are appointed in civil and staff situations, or who obtain leave to proceed to Europe, are to be struck off the returns of corps to which they may previously have belonged.

CIVIL APPOINTMENTS.

- July 17. J. Paternoster, Esq., to be register to gillah court of Salem.
- 20. F. Anderson, Esq., to be assistant to principal collector and assistant magistrate in Malabar.
- R. Cathcart, Esq., to be assistant to principal collector and assistant magistrate in Tanjore.
- conector and assistant magnificate in Tanjore.

  Aug. 7. Malcolm Lewin, Esq., to be sub-collector and joint magistrate in Tingeveily.

  G. S. Hooper, Esq., to be head assistant to principal collector and assistant magistrate in Ca-
- F. M. Lewin, Esq., to be register to zillah court of Calicut.
- A. P. Onslow, Esq., to be head assistant to principal collector and assistant magistrate in Combatore.
- 17. W. E. Underwood, Esq., to be head assistant to collector, and assistant magistrate of Guntoor.

ECCLESIASTICAL APPOINT-MENTS.

Aug. 7. The Rev. W. T. Blenkinsop to be military chaplain at Vellore.

14. The Rev. G. K. Græme to be junior military chaplain at Bangalore.

MILITARY APPOINTMENTS. PROMOTIONS, &c.

Fort St. George, June 22, 1827.—Lieut, R. Deacon, 18th N.I., to act as fort adj. at Vellore during absence of Lieut. Lewis.

- 4th L.C. Lieut. W. Sinclair to be quart. mast., interp., and paymast., v. Macleod prom.; Lleut. A. Borradaile to be adj., v. Sinclair.
- 334 N.J. Lleut. H. Marshall to be adj., v. Brady
- 41st N.I. Sen. Ens. C. W. Burdett to be licut., v. Fitzgerald dec.; dated 8th June 1827.
- June 26 .- Cadets S. W. Hennah, W. H. Rick-June 28.—Cadets S. W. Hennah, W. H. Rlek-ett, and F. G. J. Lascelles admitted to cavalty, and prom. to cornets.—Cadet S. W. Croft admit-ted to artillery, and prom. to 2d-lieut.—Cadets E. Lawford, Arch. Douglas, and F. C. Cotton admit-ted to engineers, and prom. to 2d-lieuts.—Cadets E. G. Ilames, Wm. Taylor, S. C. Macpherson, and W. R. Annesley admitted to Infantry, and prom. to ensigns;—all arrived at Madras 20th June.
- 8th L.C. Sen. Lieut. (Brev.Capt.) F. Straton to be Capt., and Sen. Corn. E. A. Humffreys to be lieut. v. Gordon dec.; all dated 12th June 1827.
- Lieut. H. Briggs, 2d L.C., re-admitted on estab, without prejudice to his rank, from 14th April
- June 29.—Lieut. C. Rochfort, 27th N.I., to command escort of his Highness the Rajah of Mysore.
- 66 L.C. Sen. Capt. R. Jeffries to be maj., Sen. Lleut. M. W. C. Smyth to be capt., and Sen. Cornets. W. J. Molony to be lleut., in suc. to Smyth retired; all dated 1st Jan. 1827.
- Lieut. J. R. Brown, 5th L.C., re-admitted on estab. without prejudice to his rank, from 14th June 1827.
- July 3.—Cadets J. Whitlock, Wm. Wyndham, and C. T. Willes admitted to cavalry, and prom. to bornets.—Cadets R. Henderson and G. Patrick-son admitted to the state of the state 10 bornets.—Cadets R. Henderson and G. Patrick-on admitted to engineers, and prom. to 20 dileuts.— Cadets D. Pearson, J. Merritt, J. Hogarth, C. H. Babington, R. Cannan, and T. A. Jewikins ad-mitted to infantry, and prom. to ensigns;—all ar-dred at Madras 25d June.— Assaute Journ. Vol. 25. No.146.

- Lieut. C. H. Baddeley, 52d N.I., and Lieut. R. D. Odell, 25th dô., to be capts by brevet, from 11th June 1827.
- July 6.—Capt. F. Hunter, 1st L.C., to be an assist. com. gen., v. Grant prom.

  41st N.I. Lieut. W. P. Macdonald to be qu. mast., interp., and paym., v. Fitzgerald dec.
- 38th N.I. Sen. Ens. A. Wallace to be lieut., v. Willis dec.; dated 30th June 1827.
- Maj. G. Drewe, 33d N.I., transferred to invalid estab. at his own request.
- Mr. G. Chester admitted on estab. as a veterlnary surg., from 23d June.
- July 10.—Capt. C. C. Bell, 34th L.I., to have charge of invalids, &c. of H.C.'s service returning to Europe in ship General Paimer.
- Head-Quarters, July 7.—Lieut. A. R. Alexander, 33d N.I., to be struck off strength of rifle corps, and app. to 1st bat. pioneers, v. Hutchins.
- Fort St. George, July 10.—33d N.I. Sen. Capt. E. Cadogan to be major, Sen. Lieut. J. Campbell to be capt., and Sen. Ens. G. A. Tulloch to be licut., v. Drewe invalided; all dated 7th July 1827. Licut. H. Inglis, 2d L.C., permitted to place his services at disposal of resident at Hyderabad.
- July 13.—Capt. R. J. H. Vivian, 18th N.I., to assist. adj. gen. to Nagpore subsid. force, v.
- 1st Brig. Horse Artil. Lieut. J. C. M'Nair to be adj., v. Sheriff prom.
- 33d N.I. Lieut. J. Hutchings to be adj., v. Marshall; Lleut. H. Marshall to be qu. mast., interp. and paymast., v. M'Clellan resigned.
- Infinitry Recruiting Depót. Lieut. J. U. Colebrooke, 43d N.I., to be qu. mast., interp., and paymast., v. Campbell.
- Infanty, Sen. Lieut, Col. C M'Leod to be lieut, col. commandant, v. Maj. Gen. and Col. Sir Thomas Munto dec.; Sen. Maj. C. Elphinstone, 20th N.1., to be lieut, col. in suc. to M'Leod prom.; both dated 7th July 1827.
- 20th N.I. Sen. Capt. J. Moncrieffe to be major, Sen. Lucut. J. Mellor to be capt., and Sen. Ens. T. G. Silver to be lieut, in suc. to Elphinstone prom.; all dated 7th July 1827.
- an dated (II July 1827.

  Mem.—In consequence of death of Maj. Gen.
  Sir. T Munro, of mf., the following addition to list of officers entitled to offi-reck commas is a authorazed:—Lieut. Cols. Com. R. Podmore and A.
  Molesworth, each a half share from 7th July 1827, v.
  Munro dec; Lieut. Col. Com. C. Decson, a half share from treasury, from 7th July 1827, v.
  dtto.
- July 17.—7th N.I. Lieut. R. E. Boardman to be adj., v. Harden returned to Europe.

- adj., v. Harden returned to Europe.

  38th N.I. Lieut. E. Clutterbuck to be qu. mast., interp., and paymast., v. Garraway dec.; Sen. Ens. J. A. Macariney to be heut., v. Garraway dec.; dated 9th July 1827.

  430 N.I. Sen. Lieut. W. B. Coxe to be capt., and Sen. Ens. J. H. Robbey to be heut., v. M'Leod dec.; dated 11th July 1827.

  Governor's Staff. Lieut. Col. J. Carfrae, 30th N.I., to be military secretary to Hon. the governor; Maj. J. Napier, 30th N.I., to be private secretary to ditto; Lieut. W. Milnes, 7th L.C.; to beaid-de-camp to ditto; Capt. T. Watson, 4th N.I., to be extra aid-de-camp to ditto; Maj. T. Maclean, 1st Europ. regt., to be honorary alde-de-camp to ditto—all to have effect from 10th July.

  Lieut. Col. H. G. A. Taylor, 18th N.I., to be
- Lieut. Col. H. G. A. Taylor, 18th N.I., to be town major of Fort St. George.
- July 20.—Surg. J. Norris to be staff surg. at Jaulnah, v. Haines.
- 2d L.C. Lieut. C. Phillimore to be qu. mast. interp., and paymast., v. Inglis permitted to plac hls services at disposal of resident at Hyderabad.
  - Lleut. R. Lambert, 16th N.I., to be adj. to Seringapatam Local Bat., v. Flyter returned to Europe.
- 1st Extra N.I. Lleut. G. Wright, 10th N.I., to act as adj. during absence of Lieut. Nicolay on sick certificate.
- Artillery. Sen. Maj. W. Morison to be lieut. col., Sen. Capt. W. T. Biett to be major, and Sen. Ist-Lieut. R. S. Yolland to be capt., v. Noble dec.; all dated 17th July 1827. 2 N

4th N.I. Sen. Lieut. A. B. Dyce to be capt., and Sen. Ens. J. E. Glynn to be lieut., v. Hall dec.; dated 16th July 1827.

Head-Quarters, July 10. — 2d-Lieut. D. Carruthers removed from 1st to 3d bat. artillery.

Veterinary Surg. G. Chester posted to 1st L.C.

July 14.—Lieut.Col.Com.C.M.'Leod (late prom.) posted to 13th N.I.; Lieut. Col. C. Elphinstone (late prom.) posted to 25th do.; Maj. G. Drewe (recently transf. to invalid estab.), posted to 2d Nat. Vet. Bat.

July 20.—Ens. P. T. Marrett removed, at his own request, from 8th to 4th N.I.

own request, from 8th to str. N.1.

July 25.—Artillery. Lieut. Col. W. Morison (late prom.) posted to 4th bat.; Maj. W. Cullen removed from 3th to 1st bat.; Maj. W. S. Watson removed from 4th to 3d bat.; Maj. W. T. Brett (late prom.) posted to 4th bat.; Capt. C. Hosmer removed from 3d to 4th bat.; Capt. R. S. Yolland (late prom.) posted to 3d bat.

July 26.—Ensigns S. G. C. Reynaud and F. H. Sanson (recently admitted) app. to do duty with 9th N.I.

July 30.—Ensigns W. Ritchie, J. Forsyth, and W. R. Annesley (recently admitted) app. to do duty with 2d N.I., and Ens. J. Dods with 21st

Aug. 2.—Ens. J. Campbell removed, at his own request, from 29th to 39th N.I.

. Assist. Surg. W. K. Hay posted to 1st brigade horse artil., at St. Thomas's Mount.

Lieut. J. Horne removed from 2d to 3d bat. ar-tillery, from 13th July.

Aug. 3.—Ens. P. E. L. Rickards (recently admitted) app. to do duty with 21st N.I.

Fort St. George, July 24.—Cadets J. Forsyth and Wm. Ritchie admitted to infantry, and prom. to July 27 .- Cadet J. C. A. Durand admitted to infantry, and prom. to ensign.

fantry, and prom. to ensign.

July 31.—Ordnance a department. Capt. C. Hosner, dep. com. of ordnance at Vellore, to be dep. com. of ordnance at Cannanore, v. Brett prom.; Assist. com. of ordnance G. Gibson to be dep. com. of ordnance at Vellore, v. Hosner; Dep. sallst. com. of ordnance S. Clarke to be assist. com. of ordnance, v. Gibson prom., and to be attached to arsenal of Fort 5t. George; Conductor W. Hrookes to be dep. assist. com. of ordnance, v. Clarke prom., and to be attached.

Mr. J. Phillipson admitted on estab. as a veteri-

Cadet S. Best admitted to engineers, and prom-to 2d-lieut.—Cadets W. Garrow and G. Davies ad-mitted to infantry, and prom- to ensigns.

Col. A. Hamilton, H.M.'s 30th regt., to command Trichlnopoly.

mand Trichinopoly.

Engineer department. Lieut. A. Douglas, of engineers, to be assist, to superintend, engineer at Jauinah; Lieut. R. Henderson, of engineers, to be assist. to superintending engineer at Nagnore; Capt. J. Purton, superintend, engineer in Centre Division, to act as superintend, engineer in Nysoor, during absence of Lieut. Nugent on sick certificate; Lieut. E. Lawford, of engineers, to be assist. to superintend, engineer in Centre Division and in Mysor; Lieut. F. C. Cotton, of engineers, to be assist. to superintend, engineer in Malabar and Canara; Lieut. G. Patrickson, of engineers, to be assist. to superintend, engineer in Southern Division.

Aug. 3.—Maj. T. S. Watson, of artil., to be principal commissary of ordnance, in charge of arsenal of Fort. St. George.

Cadets H. Gordon, R. S. Johnson, Aug. Russell, T. Master, E. Marriott, and G. P. C. Kenedy admitted to infantry, and prom. to ensign.

*Mag.7.—Lleut. R. B. Fitzgibbon, 5th L.C., permitted to place his services at disposal of resident at ityderabed.

Aug. 10.—6th L.C. Lieut. J. Babington to be quantast, interp., and paymast., v. Fitsgibbon permitted to place his services at disposal of resident at Hyderabad; Lieut. J. Grant to be adj., v. Ba-9th N. I. Lieut. J. Robertson to be adj., v. Longworth permitted to return to Europe; Lieut.

H. Roberts to be qu. mast., interp., and paymast., v. Robertson.

Assist. Surg. W. Welliton to be garrison assist, surg. at Vellore, v. Hay resigned.

Aug. 14.—Lieut. J. H. Bean to act as paymaster in Travancore and Tinnevelly, during absence of Capt. Swanston.

Head-Quarters, Aug. 6. — Veterinary Surg. J. Phillipson posted to 2d L.C.

Aug. 17.—Assist. Surg. W. Poole posted to 2d L.C., from 17th April.

Officers returned to duty, from Europe.—Lieut. Col. Wm. Clapham, 31¢ N.l.; arrived 20th June 1827.—Lieut. Col. Com. D. Foulla, 6th L.C., and Capt. P. Farquharson, 6th N.l.; both arrived 29th June—Capt. Arch. Woodburn, 4th N.l.; Lieut. B. Stapylton, 7th do; Lieut. J. Everest, 13th do; and 1st-Lieut. J. Home, artillery; all arrived 17th July.—Maj. R. Jeffries, 6th L.C.; arrived 25th July.—Lieut. G. Gibson, 33d N.l.; arrived 5th Aug.

FURLOUGHS.

To Europe. — June 22. Lieut. D. Flyter, 41st N.I., for health.—Assist. Surg. G. H. Bell, for health.—Assist. Surg. G. H. Bell, for health.—Assist. Surg. R. Power, for one year (via Bombay).—26. Ens. J. B. Hawes, 9d N.I., for health.—July 24. Capt. T. Bell, 47th N.I., Ens. A. E. B. Durant, 19th N.I., for health.—Lieut. T. A. J. J. Longworth, 9th N.I., for no year.—Aug. 7. Capt A. Lowe, of engineers.

To Sov.—Line 90. Capt. I. D. Maic. 24th N.I.

To Sea.—June 29. Capt. J. R. Haig, 34th N.I., for six months, for health.—July 23. Lieut. T. M. Cameron, 9th N.I., ditto, ditto.—Ensigns W. Buckley and W. H. Dearsley, 18th N.I., for three months, for health.

Cancelled. July 27. Ens W. E. Gibb, 4th N.I., to Bombay.

MISCELLANEOUS.

SIR THOMAS MUNRO.

We adverted in our last but shortly to the meeting which took place at the Banquetting-room, on the 21st July, to consider of the best mode of testifying the sense of the inhabitants of Madras towards their late governor.

Sir Ralph Palmer was called to the chair, and addressed the inceting; he paid a high tribute of applause to the public and private character of the deceased. He referred to his patriotic spirit, the zeal he manifested for his country's welfare, his constant care and solicitude for the profession in which he commenced his career, and of his watchfulness in providing for the comfort of every individual composing the army. Sir Ralph adverted to the well known fact of the enthusiastic ardour and devoted attachment which the Madras army, regiment after regiment, displayed when quitting their native shore for arduous foreign service, as evincing their attachment to their government. He observed, in continuation: "Witness also his equal solicitude for the welfare of those provinces ceded to the British arms which were entrusted to his, especial superinteldence and charge; his general lindness and benevolence of heart, his strict inpartiality, the undeviating rectitude of his conduct, and the equal and uniform protection which he afforded to alle-qualities which, as we have heard, did obtain for him the appellation of 'Father of the People.' Witness, though last not least, his whole conduct and demeanor, while filling the highest station in this presidency-his unceasing attention to the duties of the government, and his ardent desire to promote to the utmost of his power, the cause of justice and of truth. Here, indeed, let us not forget the facility of communication which he afforded to all; let me especially not forget, for I too can testify here the readiness with which every representation connected with the administration of the law-no matter from what quarter or court it came, which had for its object the furtherance of justice, was invariably received and attended to, and the fair and liberal manner in which it was considered. Nor was it by the graver or more serious duties of the government that he was wholly absorbed; he found time to discharge, and well indeed did he discharge, every duty which his situation imposed upon him, at the head of our society. The income which was appropriated to his high station, was freely and generously spent-his bounty, as his heart, was alike open to all. liberal aid and encouragement which he at all times afforded to our public institutions stand upon record, and who is there that can say that his private benevolence was ever appealed to in vain. Let us not forget also, the full measure of bis hospitality, or the willingness which he ever shewed to contribute with his purse to those rational amusements, which, though perhaps not congenial to his own taste, he yet knew afforded pleasure to others, and tended to promote the enjoyment of social intercourse."

Sir John Doveton, after expressing his concurrence in the sentiments just delivered, brought forward the following resolutions:

"That this meeting largely participates in the affliction of all classes of the community, native as well as European, at the calamity which has occurred in the death of our late revered governor, Majorgeneral Sir Thomas Munro, Bart, K.C.B., in the province where he had long been known by the appellation of 'Pather of the people,' and at a time when he was on the eve of returning to his native country, after a public career extending to upwards of forty-seven years, and growing in success and honour up to its close.

"That this meeting, many of whom were members of the same profession, many fellow-labourers in the same field, and all eye-witnesses of his conduct, take pride in the fame which this most honoured servant of the East-India Company first acquired in duties and scenes that are familiar to them, and which during the last seven years he consummated by the most eminent and approved public services at the head of the government of this presidency.

"That his justice, benevolence, frankness, and hospitality, were no less conspicuous than the extraordinary faculties of mind with which he was endowed, and the admirable purposes to which he incessantly applied them; and that he commanded, in a singular degree, the veneration of all persons by whom he was known.

"That to perpetuate the remembrance of his public and private virtues, a subscription be immediately opened for the purpose of erecting a statue to his memory."

Mr. Compton (the Advocate-general) expressed his sense of the high character of the late governor, in a speech, of which the following is a brief extract:

" It would not become me to enter into details, which evinced the uprightness of his mind, the strait-forwardness of his course, and the firmness and integrity of his character, nor will I do injustice to his memory by attempting imperfectly to describe what he was in private life. can however testify that every measure of his government, the nature or object of which became known to me, originated in the purest and best intentions, and was regulated by the soundest principles of The loss which we deplore canjustice not be diminished by the reflection that he was likely soon to be withdrawn from his post at the head of the government; for, had he been spared to his country and friends, he would have aided, by his talents and experience, the best interests of all connected with India. In all measures of importance associated with the policy and government of India, his opinion would have been sought, and would have been received as almost oracular, and the value of his suggestions would have been incalculable at the period to which you, Sir, have already alluded, when the present charter shall approach to its termination.

" I have said that he was exhibited to the servants of the Company as an example. He was doubly honoured by his Sovereign, and his services have been acknowledged in the most gratifying manner by the dlrectors and proprietors. He was about to be restored to the bosom of his family and his country, when alas! and his fate affords to us an awful lesson, he terminated his brilliant and almost unprecedented career, nearly on the spot where it was commenced! Those who hear me must feel, that we can scarcely expect to look on his like again! Most heartily do I therefore adopt the resolution, and I hope that the statue may be placed in some conspicuous place, so that the sight of it may encourage the hopes and excite the emulation

I lation of every writer and cadet who may land at Madras, who will view in this last tribute of our feeling, how much Sir Thomas Munro was respected, and how sincerely he is regretted."

The resolutions were unanimously adopted by the meeting.

The subicriptions to the object of this meeting amounted on the 29th of August to 69,154 Madras rupees, and it is intended to apply the surplus of what remains after the cost of the statue is provided for, to procure a portrait of Sir Thomas, to be placed amongst those of the other benefactors of Madras.

KOLAPORE.

A letter from Belgaum, inserted in the Madras Courier, of Aug. 28th, state that the Kolapore Rajah had again become troublesome, and that a division order had been issued to the British forces in the immediate neighbourhood, directing the corps, &c. to hold themselves in readmess to move at the shortest notice. The letter adds—" the sacking of Kolapore must surely take place during some part of this, our third campaign—it is, I am told, to be taken by assault."

The Bombay papers contain further particulars from private letters, which state that a large force is concentrating in this quarter. From Poonah two detachments marched towards the end of September, and a third is spoken of. The Belgaum force left Belgaum on the 7th September, and joined another force at Cotabagy. One of the letters from Belgaum states :-" It is impossible, emidst the contradictory opinions prevailing at this place, to say whether war or peace will be the order of the day; but, judging from the extent of the preparations now made, the great expense that has obviously been inchired, and the circumstances of this being the third armament in less than two years, I imagine that things will go rather hard with the raja, and that the British government is determined to assert its consequence.

ASSASSINATION OF COL. DAVIES.

The India Gazette of June 11, contains some additional particulars respecting the causes of the mutiny at the head-quarters of the Nizam's cavalry, in a letter dated Mominabad, 8th May. The regiment, it must be remembered, forms part of the Nizam's force,

There has been lately a mutiny here at the head-quarters of the Nizam's cavalry division, and Colonel Davies, who commanded, was killed, and another officer wounded. Dissatisfaction had been excited by innovations of various kinds, and the climax was, that an officer caused a soldier to be shaved by force, which was contrary to Colonel Davies's orders, and to their religious prejudices, as Mus. On the morning of the 6th selmans. inst. the native officer who commanded the guards of the day, marched the whole of the men on duty to the parade ground. where he planted a standard, and said. that they had endured so many insults, that they must go altogether to the Colonel. to demand redress and their discharge. On hearing this, the whole of the men. but 34, returned to their lines; this circumstance being reported to Col. Davies. he mounted his horse and rode down to the parade, attended by his acting brigade major, and four orderlies; at the same time ordering the men of another regi-ment to mount and come down to the parade. When he came close to the mutineers, he asked them what they wanted. and they replied that they would not talk to him while he was surrounded by armed men. Colonel Davies immediately sent them all away to the mounted regiment. which was now halted at a short distance, and riding into the midst of the mutineers, who were on foot, said to them, " now I am alone among you, tell me what you want," They said, "we have lately suffered many insults, and no longer ago than last night a mun was dragged from the parade by Dhers, and was forcibly shaved; we can no longer bear this, and must have our discharge." He replied, "this is not the way to demand your discharge, and you shall not have it." The mutineers then said, "go away Colonel Salub, we do not want to hart you, go away.' Colonel Davies struck the hilt of his sword with his hand, and said, "I am not to be threatened, lay down your arms," (they did so) "and I will pardon every man, but the one who has planted this standard." As he said the last words, they took up their arms again, and the native officer who had planted the standard, laid hold of Davies's bridle with one hand, and with the other placed a pistol close to his left breast and fired; the horse's rearing caused the ball to pass through the abdomen, and he fell off his horse. The native officer called out "mar! mar!" (kill! kill!) and the mutineers all fired, and commenced cutting him with their swords. The moment the first shot was fired, the regiment, which was mounted, charged, and was among them in ten seconds; the officer and five men were killed on the spot, nine were wounded, of which four mortally, thirteen were taken, and seven escaped among the ravines and haystacks, where horsemen could not follow. Parties went out after them. Some of the men got into the pagoda, and made a desperate resistance before they were taken or killed. The mounted men shewed the greatest devotion to Col. Davies, several throwing themselves on his body to save him from cuts; two of them were wounded severely. two slightly, two horses killed, and two wounded. Lieut. Stirling had his right hand nearly cut off; Lieut. Harington had his horse shot dead under him. He who was the cause of all, had several shots through his clothes, but escaped unhurt. What is most surprising is, that poor Davies, after two shots through bis body and eleven sabre cuts, got up, mounted his horse, and rode some disspring, fell violently to the ground close to Dr. Morgan's feet, whom he desired to carry him home; he was sensible to the last

" Mrs. Dave, her niece, and a lady living with them, are said to have seen the whole from the terrace of the house."

FETE AT HYDERABAD.

The Madras Gazette contains an account of an entertainment given at Hyderabad, on the 10th Angust, by a party of bachelors. After dancing, 140 persons sat down to an excellent supper. "At the top of the room," says the account, "was a transparency, representing his Satanic Majesty running off with Hymen." It is added, that the example thus given by the bachelors, (whether with reference to the entertainment or the transparency is not clear,) is likely to be imitated at Hyderabad. A play, by the amateur performers of the station, was in contemplation, to be followed by a ball, to be given by the freemasons of Hyderabad to their fair sisters.

WESTFYAN MISSIONARY SOCIETY.

The eighth anniversary of the Wesleyan Missionary Auxiliary Society for Madras was held on the 9th Aug, and very numerously attended. The report of the society contained a summary of the proceedings of the body in various parts of the world. The receipts of the parent society for 1826 were stated to be upwards of fortyfive thousand pounds sterling, a sum nearly equal to the receipts of the preceding year notwithstanding the distresses of the mother country; the Madras Auxiliary Society receipts from January to December, 1826, amounted to three thousand rupees. More than one hundred missionaries are employed in the work, having under their care 32,960 members of the Society. Twelve thousand scholars recuve instruction in the schools connected with these missions .- Mad. Gov. Gaz.

SHIPPING.

Arrivals

July 17. Rorburgh Castle, Denney, from London,—18. Maria, Strong, from Cape and Port Louis.—24. John, Freeman, from Calcutta.—25. Potestor, Waugh, from London.—26. Suary, Hampler, from Calcutta.—29. Sir Edicard Pages, Geary, from London, Lisbon, and Cape.—4ug. 1. 4m, Cattell, from Cape and Mauritius.—4. Grecian, Smith, and George, Fulcher, both from London.—5. Woodford, Chapman, from Calcutta.—6. Sultan, Mitchell, from Bombay.—7. Uzerope, Ferau, from Bordeaux.—14. Coldstream, Stephens, from Calcutta.—15. Abgarris, Smith, from Bourbon.—16. Simpson, Black, from the Mauritius.—23. Minerus, Probyn, from London.—26. Lady East, Evans, from London.—31. Resource, Fenn, from London.

Departures.

Departures.

July 18. L'Actif. Chaveleur, for Bordeaux.—18, Maria, Strong, for Eskapilly and Calcutta.—21. Borneys. Charties, for Penang, Singapore, and China.—18. And Park. Castel, Pienney, for Calcutta.—18. And Park. Castel, Pienney, for Calcutta.—18. And Park. Castell, for Calcutta.—28. Waterios. Manning, for former Structures. Manning, for former Structures. And Calcutta and Ann. Cattell, for Calcutta.—7. Sir Edward Parget, Geavy, and George, Falcher, both for Calcutta.—10. Sultan, Mitchell, for Calcutta.—11. General Kyd, Nairne, for Penang, Singapore, and China.—14. Woodford, Chapman, for the Mauritius.—15. Abgarris, Smith, for Eskapilly and Calcutta.—22. Simpson, Black, for Calcutta.—23. Grectan, Smith, for Calcutta.—23. Grectan, Smith, for Calcutta.—23. Grectan, Smith, for Calcutta.—23. Stretan, Stephens, for London.

BIRTHS

March 23. On board the homeward-bound ship Thaina, the lady of R. W. Poe, Esti, of a son. July 11. At Kullaidgee, the lady of Capt. D. Macleod, 4th L.C., of a son.!
12. At Berhampore, the lady of Lieut. R. W. Lang, 37th regt., of a still-born child.
13. At Hyderabad readency, Mrs. S. Rousscau, of a son.

of a son.

14. At the residency, Nagpore, the lady of Capt. Isacke, assistant resident, of a son.

15. At Trichinopoly, the lady of Capt. Tweede, of a daughter.

16. The lady of Capt. Thos. Daniel, H.M.'s 28th regt., of a son and heir.

21. At Secunderabad, the lady of Major Clarke, 21.

II.M.'s 46th regt., of a son.

23. At Nagpore, the lady of Capt. F. W. Hands, 30th Madras N.I., and under the resident at Nagpore, of a son.

— At Jaulnah, the lady of Capt. John Wright.

At Jaumati, the say of capt come of the dydregr, of a daughter.

25. At Seringapatam, the lady of F. Pulham, Esq., garnson assist surg, of a son.

26. At Pondicherry, the lady of F. De Fond-

26. At Pondicherry, the lady of F. De Fond-clair, Esq., of a son.
27. Mrs. L. Griffiths, of a son.
28. At Carmanore, Mrs. E. M'Malion, of a son.
29. At Jaulnah, the lady of Capt. B. Blake, 45th regt., of a daughter.
— The lady of Alex. Johnston, Esq., of a son.
30. At Kamptee, near Nagpore, the lady of Capt. L. At Tranquebar, Mrs. M. C. Penman, of a daughter. daughter.

daughter.

Aug. 1. At Courtailum, the lady of W. R. Taylor, Esq., civil service, of a son.

— At Royapetta, Mrs. W. Cooke, of a daughter.

2. At Cannanore, the lady of Capt. a. Hill, H.M.'s 54th regt., of a daughter.

4. At Tranqueber, the lady of J. Horsley, Esq., civil service, of a daughter.

6. The lady of H. Byrne, Esq., of a son.

— The lady of A. Kerakoose, Esq., of a daughter.

6. At Mangalore, the lady of J. Babington, Esq., civil service, of two sons, the lady of J. Karakoose, Esq., of a daughter.

9. At Sholapore, the lady of Lieut. Jas. Alexamder, of a soul.

— The lady of H. Chamier, Esq., of a daughter.
11. At Trichinopoly, the lady of Lieut. M Nelll, 6th L.C., deputy assist adj. gen. Southern Division, of a daughter.

— At Vizianagram, the lady of Lieut. J. C.
Coffin, 12th N.L., of a still-born child.
12. At Bellary, the lady of John Hay, Esq., superint. surgeon in the Ceded Districts, of a son.

— Mrs. M. Skillern, of a daughter.
14. The lady of Joseph Balnbridge, Esq., of a daughter.

14. The lady of Joseph Ballotsey, —, addaughter.
— At Poonamallee, Mrs. Hamilton, of a son.
15. At Rajahmundry, Mary Rose, lady of H.
Vibart, Esq., civil service, of a son still-born.
19. The lady of Geo. Moore, Esq., civil service.

21. At Pailamanair, the lady of Chas. Roberts, Esq., civil service, of a son.

— At Manulipatam, the lady of E. B. Glass, Esq., civil service, of a son.

26. The lady of Capt. Chase, of a son.

MARRIAGES.

MARIAGES.

July 9. At Bellary, Mr. C. H. Boyle, son of the late Mr. H. Boyle (a free merchant of Bengal), to Miss J. M. Douglas.

18. At the Capuchin Church, Mr. M. D'Fontine, to Frances Emelis, youngest daughter of Mr. M. Temanfield.

24. At Trichinopoly, S. J. Humfrays, Esq., 5th regt. L.C., to Miss F. L. Koefoed.

25. Mr. Edm. Vincent, to Grace Frances, daughter of Mr. R. Godfrey.

30. At St. Mary's Church, Mr. Jos. Downan, to Miss Ells. Freeman.

— Mr. Geo. Mac Farlain, to Miss M. Doyle.

— Mr. Wm. Todd, to Miss A. Saville.

Aug. 4. At St. Mary's Church, Capt. Geo. Gahan, of the brig Lady Muro, to Georgiana, eldest daughter of the late Capt. Chas. Eaton, aster attendant of Coringa.

20. At Bangalore, Lieut. Jas. Brigges, dep. astet qu. mast. gen. Mysore division, to Sophia, second daughter of the Rev. G. Marshall, rector of Dosagh, county of Domegal, Ireland.

Lately. At St. George's Church, Capt. M. A. Albonas, to the widow of the late Leleut. Roche, B. At Belgaum, Lieut. A. M. D. Elder, ad., 1st. Bombey Euron, reet. to Matikla Ann. Schlarg, and — At Belgaum, Lieut. A. M'D. Elder, adj. 1st Bombay Europ. regt., to Matilda Ann, 5th daugh-ter of Lieut. Col. J. Welsh, commanding in the

DEATHS.

May 9. In Moalmein, Mr. J. C. Armstrong, aged 24.

aged 24.

June 11. At the Mysore residency, Capt. T. Y.

B. Kennan, hone artillery.

July 3. At Anjengo, in Travancore, Mr. P. Philipz, superintendent of police at that place.

10. At Secunderabad, Louisa, wife of Lieut. R.

Codrington, 46th N.I., aged 18.

12. At Vizagapatam, Lieut. Josiah Cecil, Carnatic Europ. Vet. Bat.

— At Berhampore, Eliza Harriot, lady of Lieut.

Lang, 37th rect.

Lang, 37th regt.
— At Pondicherry, Adrian De Fries, Esq., in his

— "At Pondicherry, Adrian De Fries, Esq., in nis 70th year.

14. At Ramnad, Helen, daughter of the late M. Christy, Esq., formerly on the medical establishment of this presidency, in her 17th year.

16. At Belgaum, Mr. John Marrett, aged 20.

27. At Pursevaulkum, Catherine, wife of Mr. G. Dent, aged 28.

31. Mr. W. Beck, commissariat department.

**Aux.** 4. At Ellichpoor, Capt. Mathew Young, of H.M.'s 30th regt.

9. At Cannanore, Eliza, wife of Mr. C. R.

of H.M.'s 30th reqt.

9. At Cannanore, Eliza, wife of Mr. C. R.
M'Mahon, assistant surveyor.

At Mangalore, Jane, wife of John Babington, Esq., of the Madras civil service.

14. Capt. Paul Secluna, of H.M.'s 4th Ceylon regt., after a lingering illness.

17. At Manantoddy, in Wynaad, Indiane Laura, lady of Capt. T. Locke, after a short but severe illness.

illiness.
21. At the presidency, Lieut. Col. Read, dep. qu. mast gen. of H.M.'s forces.
27. At Royapettah, Elizabeth, wife of Mr. F. Aubert, aged 21.

Bombay.

LAW.

SUPREME COURT.

Parry v. Graham .- This was a proceeding arising out of a squabble between Mr. Parry, a barrister of the court, and Mr. Graham, an attorney. The particulars of the squabble are given by a friend of Mr. Graham in the Bombay Gazette. It thence appears that on the 25th May, Mr. Graham sent instructions to Mr. Parry to draw a plaint, on which was endorsed a requisition for expedition. The papers were returned by Mr. Parry on the 19th June, with a remark in the shape of an opinion. They were then re-delivered to Mr. Parry, with the following words in the margin: "I am much obliged to you for your very early attention to the case. Mr. Parry thereupon sent his purvoe to Mr. Graham to demand an apology for these words, or he would move the court. Mr. Graham, it is said, " kicked the purvoe out of his office, with an observation that his master might follow sown course." On looking at the papers left by the purvoe, Mr. Graham found the words " case for opinion" written on the "instruc. tions;" and he wrote to Mr. Parry to ask in whose hand-writing the words were. and receiving no answer, intimated to that gentleman that he should construe Mr. Parry's silence into an admission that the words were written by him. On the same day Mr. Graham received from Mr. Parry's clerk the following note :-

" I am directed by Mr. Parry to inform Mr. Graham that a part only of the original instructions relating to the accompanying draft plaint are returned, together with a correct copy of that part which Mr, Parry (after receiving Mr. Graham's note of this day's date) has thought proper for the present to retain."

Mr. Graham thereupon wrote to Mr, Parry, stating that he considered this communication to have been purposely adopted by Mr. P. as a personal insult, and demanding the return of the original documents.

Mr. Parry (the statement then alleges) on the same day (23d June) moved the court for an attachment for contempt against Mr. Graham, on the ground that the last note had so much enervated him, that he was rendered incompetent to perform his professional duties. The court refused the motion; but upon Mr. Parry then saying that he would swear the peace against Mr. Graham, that he was afraid of bodily harm, an attachment was ordered to issue.

June 25.

Mr. Dewar moved, on behalf of Mr. Parry, that Mr. Graham should give securities to keep the peace, pursuant to articles exhibited on the 23d.

Mr. Mill, counsel for Mr. Graham, opposed the application; he said he had an affidavit to present on the part of Mr. Graham, but he thought the court could not receive it.

Mr. Roper, junior counsel for Mr. Graham, entertained a different opinion from Mr. Mill. Although the court might refuse contradictory affidavita, a confirmatory matory affidavit, merely explaining Mr. Graham's motives, might be received.

After some further discussion between the court and the two counsel, Mr. Roper declined pressing the reception of the affidavit.

Mr. Graham now tendered his sureties, himself in 5,000 rupees, and Mr. George Forbes and Mr. Ranken in 2,500 rupees each, which were accepted.

Mr. Roper then moved, that Mr. Parry should be ruled to deliver Mr. Graham the part of a brief which bore Mr. Parry's signature as acknowledgment for the receipt of a fee, and which he had refused to return.

The Advocate general rising. - My Lord, in the name of the profession, I protest-

The Court.—We can hear nothing, Mr. Advocate-general, in the name of the profession. The court will no doubt be able to dispose of the matter. Mr. Roper, have you any precedent? Upon what grounds do you make application?

Mr. Roper admitted he had no precedent, but he grounded his motion upon custom. He however finally withdrew it.

July 2.

Mr. Dewar this day moved, on behalf of Mr. Parry, that Mr. Graham should answer the affidavit of Mr. Parry, in relation to the matter already stated.

After considerable argument, the court refused the motion.

At a subsequent period of the day, Mr. Dewar made a second motion on behalf of Mr. Parry, for a criminal information against Mr. Graham; this motion, after a long argument, was rejected by the court; the Judges intimated that the only course of proceeding against Mr. Parry was by malectment, the matter being purely private

The Judges (Sir R. Rice and Sir C. Chambers) animadverted, it is said in the Gazette, in strong terms, upon the erroeous conceptions of Mr. Parry, and upon the uncourteous course he had pursued in sending his purvoe to Mr. Graham.

July 24.

Onan Kivork, an Armenian, was then put to the bar, charged with shooting at Bugwan Gosavé, a ghorah wallah, on the night of the 11th of June last. This was the occurrence mentioned in page 111.

Nunnoo Shaik Dervish, coachman to John J. Sparrow, Esq. deposed, that he was driving Mrs. Sparrow, with two young ladies and a gentleman, from church, on the night in question, when a man, habited like a Mogul, rode up to the side of the carriage, and called out to him 'stop.' For some time the witness paid no attention to the man. At last he commenced abusing the witness in gross terms: the ghora wallah then jumped down and seized the horseman's bridle.

The horseman raised a pistol, discharged it at the ghora wallah, and rode off. Witness was quite sure the prisoner at the bar was the horseman alluded to.

The ghora wallah and other witnesses confirmed the statement.

An attempt was made by Mr. Norton, on the part of the prisoner, to prove he was insanc.

The jury brought in a verdict of guilty. They, however, recommended him to mercy, on account of his youth, and in the hope his punishment might act as a warning to him in future.

August 5.

Hurgovandas Jug jeevandass, a Hindu, whose conviction, on an indictment charging him with wilful and corrupt perjury, in twelve different assignments, and conspiracy, for the purpose of invalidating a will, under which he was an executor, we recorded p. 111, was sentenced to two years' imprisonment in Bombay gaol. The editor of the Bombay Gazette expresses a hope that it may operate as an example to the respectable portion of the native community.

MISCELLANEOUS.

NATIVE EDUCATION SOCIETY.

In our last vol. p. 249, we gave a short report, from a Bombay paper, of a general meeting of this Society, held on the 20th January, 1827. We have recently received a copy of their third report, from which it is gratifying to perceive, that, with limited means and resources, this society has been enabled, through the combined exertions of its zealous supporters, European and native, to make considerable progress in educating the natives of that part of India.

The report is distributed under three heads: 1st, books; 2d, schoolmasters; The works printed since the 3d, schools. last general meeting are of an elementary character, and 16 in number, in the Marat'ha, Goojratee, and Hindoostanee, of which about 17,000 copies have passed the press. Others, in a state of forwardness or in preparation, are of a higher stamp, and "mark the gradual development of the society's utility, and the increasing taste amongst the natives for compositions of a superior class." The report pays a compliment to the liberality of the local government, which, besides a monthly contribution, has charged the society with the immediate power of distributing prizes of from 100 to 5,000 rupees, for approved translations or original compositions, for the promotion of the intellectual and moral improvement of the natives, which has been attended with beneficial results. Works on subjects of a literary and scientific nature, for translation as well as for the study of the natives, (who acquire a classical classical knowledge of the English language), are expected to be furnished by the Court of Directors from England.

Connected with the preparation of books, the education of schoolmasters forms one principal branch of the duties undertaken by the Society. Under the patronage of the exernor in Council, a set of young men were put under a course of training, of whom, when qualified, 14 were placed by Government under the collectors in the Deccan and 10 in Goojrat, with a monthly salary of 20 rupees each, defrayed (as well as the expense of forwarding them to their destinations) by Government.

"The qualifications of all these men consist, 1st, in reading and writing correctly their mother tongue, both in Balbod'h, as it is called on this side of India, or Deb Nagree, as it is termed in Upper Hindoostan, which is the character the committee have decided on adopting for all their printed books; and also in the written or current hand for letter-writing and general business, respectively used in Maharashtra and Goojrat; 2dly, in a know-ledge of arithmetic in all its rules on the European system; 3dly, a respectable acquaintance with the grammatical principles of their language (a study hitherto never cultivated or thought of in the vernaenlar dialects); and 4thly, in a competent knowledge of the improved system of managing schools, which the committee have long since determined to adopt, from experiencing its beneficial tendencies, and which the government has expressed its earnest desire to uphold."

An application, backed by the recommendation of the governor, has been made to the Court of Directors, to obtain the aid of one or more well educated English gentlemen, who might be able to discipline a set of native teachers and professors in the higher departments of literature and science; and also to obtain the appointment of two English superintendents of the masters and their establishments, who should be capable of holding public examinations, awarding prizes, &c.

In speaking of the schools, the report alleges the general advancement of the scholars in their studies, and the great accession to their numbers, as demonstrating the efficiency of the system adopted, and the confidence of the native population in the efforts of the society. The progress made in the English school is less than in the Marat'ha and Goojratee schools. The committee, in a report to the government, assign very satisfactory grounds for considering that "the moral and intellectual culture of the native mind is most successfully effected by employing the native language as the medium of communication." Provision is, however, made for teaching English to such as desire it. The number of scholars at present, in the English school, Marat'has and Goojratees, amount to sixty boys.

" As before observed, none of the boys of the English school have acquired such a knowledge of this language as would enable them to employ it as the medium of acquiring or communicating useful knowledge: most of the students are disposed at present rather to regard the ac. quirement of English useful only as a qualification for a scribe in a public office. and several have quitted the school after attaining this scanty knowledge. There is, consequently, little hope of obtaining for some time, from the establishment, natives imbued with the proficiency requisite for translating English standard works into their own dialects, or for effectually assisting in promoting the objects of this institution."

The other schools are more numerously attended: the Central Marat'ha School consists of 93 boys, who have all made a creditable advancement in their studies, The Central Goojratee School has 74, chiefly Parsees, "a circumstance still evincing a continuance, among some of the Hindoo Goojratees of this island, of that lukewarmness in the cause of education so much lamented at the last general meeting, and still so much to be deplored." The inferior seminaries contain 141 boys. The schools of the second order, in the interior, maintained by government, are 14 in the Decean, and 10 in Goojrat; they are too recent to admit of any inference being made from their condition. "It is a subject, however," says the report, "of great satisfaction to the committee to learn, that, with the exception of one or two instances, their institution is hailed by the natives as a munificent instance of protection and regard from the rulers of the country, and that their increasing popularity demands the most vigorous exertions on the part of the committee to augment the number of instructors.'

These exertions, we regret to say, are impeded by the want of adequate funds. Such undertakings as these deserve every possible encouragement from government and the community, native as well as European.

ENGINEER INSTITUTION.

An examination of the pupils at the Engineer Institution, under the charge of Captain Jervis, took place on Thursday last, in presence of the Honourable the Governor. We attended there, and were much pleased in being present at so interesting a display of science in India, and can safely say that the proficiency of the scholars excited the admiration of all present. The examination took place in these three languages, English, Mahratta, and Guzeratte, and comprized the following branches of science—Arithmetic in all its rules;—Practical Geonetry;—Algebra;—Elements of Euclid;—Plane Trigonometry;—Mensuration; — Topographic and Architectural Drawing.

The system which has been pursued under the superintendance of Captain Jervis has been eminently successful, and the result, as displayed at the late examination, confers on him the greatest credit. To the governor, whose attention has always been directed to the improvement of the natives in every branch of useful knowledge, the examination must have been particularly graiffying, and those who are instructed must always remember to whom they owe the benefits of their education in the above branches of science.—

Bombay Gazette, July 19.

Capt. Jervis is the European secretary of the Bombay Native Education Society before spoken of, and we observe that a very high compliment is paid, in the resolutions at the general meeting of that society, "to his able, zealous, and unwaited exertions in forwarding its success."

DISPUTE AMONGST THE PARSEES.

We noticed in the Courner of last Saturday week, a translation from a Guzeratee paper, in the form of an advertisement, inentioning in a cursory manner the contest which is now at its height between the two factions of the Parsees concerning the Kubbeesa; and as it was there proposed to seek a decision from Government, a few particulars may not prove uninteresting to the miblic.

The epoch of the Persian solar year is carried up by their historians to Jamshed. above 800 years before the Christian era. " It consists of twelve months of 30 days each, five days more being added to a particular month, to make the number 365, and in order to account for the six additional hours which we embrace in our leap year, another month was intercalated at the end of every 120 years, and celebrated with the greatest festivity. In this rotation, it continued until the year 636; when Yesdegud the 3d, the last of the Sassanian dynasty, being dethroned by the Arabians, the intercalations of the solar year, or the observance of the Kubbeesa, were neglected. It was upon this occasion that a band of Persians, being unwilling to comply with the laws of their conquerors, took refuge in Hindoostan. From that body of refugees the Parsees of the present day are descended. These renewed the Kubbeesa, except a few, who, departing from the custom of their ancestors, entered upon a new doctrine, and maintained that the Kubbeesa never existed. Hence the origin Asuatic Journ. Vol. 25. No. 146.

of the two factions: the Shersayans who defend the Kubbeesa, and Chooreegarians who are opposed to them. The latter have given the name of "Rushmees," signifying "innovator," to the former, and assumed the title of "Kudmees" or "ancient," for themselves.

For many hundred years the controversy has lain dormant, each party observing unmolested their own side of the question.

However, alout 9 or 10 months ago, Moola Firoz, one of the wisest and most able of the Chooreegarians, published a paper in Guzeratee, setting forth that by an ancient and rare book called "Abourahan," lately discovered, he could prove that the Kubbeesa never was observed; and in order to shew this more clearly, he quoted five or six paragraphs from the book above-mentioned, all confirmatory of his assertion.

This proceeding was the cause of great uncasiness to the Shersayans, since they knew that the ignorance of the lower class of their brethren would induce them to change their opinions, without inquiring into the truth of Moola Firoz's statements.

One thing, however, was remarkable, that Moola Firoz declined allowing any of them to peruse his book. This had excited their suspicions.

In the course of this conflict of opinion, another Abourahan was discovered, and as its contents were at variance with the work in Moola Firoz's possession, the whole of the affair assumed a grave aspect. From that moment the native newspapers became the organs of the different parties, and waged a paper war on the subject with as much confidence as ever characterized the conflicts of Whig and Tory; but now they have seemingly grown tired of the controversy, and appeal to Government to settle it. Be it determined as it may, we cannot refrain from observing that the rise and progress of the Kubbeesa can be traced from century to century, and is supported by the united testimony of authors both in the Persian and Arabic languages .- Iris, July 17.

ROBBERIES.

The robberies in Colabah have since the commencement of the monsoon been so frequent and daring, that it really becomes incumbent on all who wish to preserve their property, to take extraordinary pre-The following instances will suffice to show the audacity of the thieves. In the course of the last week they broke, during the night, even into an officer's house who has a regular European guard, and took away a few articles without discovery. On the following evening they had the impudence to stop a gentleman's gardener, and ask him how many sabibs resided in his master's house? To which 20 he had the ready wit to reply (although not the actual case) "three officers, and twenty soldiers." Upon this they made off, fearing, no doubt, too warm a reception.—Bombay G.z. July 21.

About three of the on Monday morning a gang of toobers surrounded the house of Lient. Fraser, of the artillery, at Matoonga, forcibly entered it, and while some of them kept watch, and others endeavoured to overpower the servants, several of them attacked that gentleman, who in attempting resistance received two sabre cuts across the forchead. The alarm was immediately given, and a party of the main patrol rushed to the spot; but the thieves were too alert, and escaped, taking with them a sword and blunderbluss-in their hurry, they left behind a scabbard and a pair of shoes, which we trust may prove a clue to the discovery of these daring ruffians. We have heard of several other burglaries lately, and ladeed the island is infested with numbers of audacious villains, who seem to act as if there did not exist a power to restrain them, -Id. Aug. 1.

Ceplon.

CIVIL APPOINTMENTS.

May 7. J. S. Rodney, Esq., to be assistant to revenue commissioners in Kandyan provinces.

W. H. Whiting, Esq., to be an extra assistant in thief secretary's office.

Ang. 4. R. M. Sneyd, Esq., to be provincial judge of Gall and Matura, v. C. Scott, Esq., deceased.

F. J. Templar, Esq., to be collector of Chilaw and provincial judge of Calpentyn, v. R. M. Sneyd, Esq.

BIRTHS.

July 10. At Point de Galle, the lady of Col. Ximenes, 16th Infantry, of a son. 12. At Colombo, the lady of Col. Muller, Ceylon Regt., of a son.

25. At Kandy, the wife of D. Lansberger, of a son.

- At Marendian, Mrs. De Saram, of a son.

Aug. 5. At Manaar, Mrs. A. C. Bartholomeus,

Aug. of a son.

Lately, The lady of his Exc. Lieut. Gen. Sir Edw. Barnes, of a son.

MARRIAGES.

May 25. At Calpentyn, J. De R. Pulle, merchant, to Anne Isabella, daughter of P. Velaide Pulle, of Mampone. 29. Mr. W. Williams, proctor of the provincial

29. Mr. W. Williams, proctor of the provincial count of Calpentyn, to Johanna Adrana, only daughter of Adranus Sleggers, book-keeper, and second member of the landraad, in the Dutch East-India service

DEATHS.

July 30. At Colombo, Mr. A. C. De Vos, aged

Lately. The infant son of his Exc. Lieut. Gen. Sir Edward Barnes.

Penang.

SUPPRESSION OF THE GAZETTE.

The following notice appears in the Penang Gazette of August 4:—

Notice.—The proprietor and publisher of the Prince of Wales' Island Gazette respectfully announces to the subscribers and the public, that circumstances compel him to discontinue the publication of the gazette, and takes this occasion to return his grateful thanks for the liberal support and patronage afforded to that contains the property of the p

The Singapore Chronicle of Aug. 30, contains the following remark upon this subject:—" It appears that the paper actually has been suppressed in consequence of an article which appeared in it some three months ago relative to the Siamese treaty, which has given umbrage to the government in Bengal, and at its instance the paper has been crushed. We state a matter of fact; but as the censorship will benceforth press more heavily on us than hitherto, we can add no comment, an in-ability which we the less regret, as many of our readers will be of opinion that no comment is required."

MURDERS.

Penang Gazettes mention that several atrocious murders, accompanied with circumstances of peculiar barbarity, had been committed on the island, and in province Wellesley. The perpetrators were Malay, as well as the victims. The motives to the deeds were either jealousy, or a desire of revenge. In one case the assassin, after murdering his wife, attacked her mother, two sisters and brother, all of whom were more or less wounded, and one died.

Singapore.

THE BUCKINGAMSHIRE.

During the thunder storm last Sunday evening, the H. C. S. Buckinghamshur was struck by the lightning, which shivered some of her upper masts, and killed a man upon deck; another, who was near him at the time, narrowly escaping the same fate.—Ibid, Aug. 30.

REPORTED DISTURBANCE AMONGST THE CHINESE.

The report of a disturbance amongst the Chinese at this settlement, mentioned on the insecure authority of the Bengal Hurkaru, in p. 113, is contradicted in the Singapore Chronicle of Aug. 30, the editor of which paper pronounces it "as impudent a calumny as ever appeared in the columns of a newspaper," which is affirming a great deal. The editor of the Chronicle further observes: "We cannot forbear mentioning here how much we regret to observe in Calcutta an eager credence given to every report injurious to the Governor of these settlements, no matter how extravagant or absurd: this is not right, and and even as a matter of policy it should be avoided, for the falsehood of all such stories is infallibly detected, and in the end they can prove nothing but the shameless mendacity of those who invent them; and in those who receive them, either great credulity, or a predisposition to believe any thing likely to throw discredit on the head of this government."

BIRTH.

Aug. 10. The lady of Maj. Mallandaine, of a son-

DEATHS.

Ang. 11. Mr. Cheeseman, midshipman of the 11,C's ship Lowther Custle. Sopt. 7. Mr. Jas Bruce, surgeon of the H.C.'s ship Furquiarson, by drowning.

Malacca.

DEATH.

Mag 29. At Clay-Bang, Mrs. Humphreys, wife of the Rev. James Humphreys, aged 31.

Madagascar.

DEATH.

July 31. At Tamatava, where he had been sent to King Radama, on a special mission by his Exc. the Governor of the Mauritius, Lieut. H. Cole, of the royal staff corps, and adie-de-camp to Lieut. Gen. the Hon. Str G. Lowry Cole, &c. &c.

Aetherlands India.

The Batavian Gazette of October 6 contains a proclamation from the Viscount Dubus de Gisignies, commissary general of the Netherlands possessions in India, to the people of Java, dated at Salatiga, Sept. 26, calling upon such as have remained faithful to persevere in their fidelity, and such as have revolted to return and acknowledge their errors, and they shall be treated as friends and allies. The following pssagae is rather amusing .- "A great part of you, li tening to the voice of a mutinous priest, have taken arms against their pawful prince and governor. They cheushed the chimerical idea that religious worship was in question. See what has become of most of those unhappy people! They have been obliged to quit their homes and their domestic relations; driven from place to place, they wander as fugitives in foreign lands, where they must procure the necessaries of life by rapine and pillage, and for the most part die a cruel and miserable death: their houses are destroyed; their fields laid waste. # Look, on the other hand, at your countrymen, who submissive to the legitimate authority, have remained quiet. They have not ceased to enjoy domestic happiness; they have the protection of the chiefs and of our warriors; they preserve the entire liberty of their religious worship; their plantations of rice are cultivated at the regular periods; they are in prosperity, and have abundance. It would not have been difficult for us, by means of our own force, and it would have been still less so, supported by efficacious assistance of the Great Emperor of Socracarta, as of our faithful allies the Sultans of Madura and Sumanab, to reduce the insurgents and to punish their rebellion; but we have spared them, because we love the Javanese people, and because most of them had been misled by their instigators."

Persia.

The Petersburgh papers are filled with details respecting the entry of the Russian troops into Tabreez, the negociations for peace, and the military arrangements and dispositions of the troops consequent upon this event. Gen. Paskewisch has appointed a provisional government for Tabreez and the province of Azerbijan, consisting of Baron Osten Sackera, chief director of Tabreez, Prince Chercheradzeff, and other Russian officers, Fiti Ali Khan, Beglerbeg of Tabreez, and Aga Amir Fata Seid, thief of the clergy of Azerbijan. The fort of Alanji has been occupied by the Russian troops, and Prince Eritoff has been directed to take possession of Ardebil, where immense stores are said to exist.

Prince Abbas Mirza has had an interview with Gen. Paskewisch. He was received by Gen. Benkendorf with military honours, and on the 6th November, Gen. Paskewisch proceeded to Dei Kargan, where he met the prince. The conferences began on the 10th, and continued on the two following days. The aspect of the Russian troops seems to have made a great impression on the prince and his oflicers. The Persian troops are much dejected at the result. The dignified manners of the prince is the theme of general encomium. One account says, "it is impossible to describe the nobleness of his manners, or his grace and affability. His features are perfeetly regular; his eyes large, lively and penetrating, and his teeth fine. His complexion is brown and pile; his hair and long beard very black, and his costume was very simple—only his dagger was ornamented with valuable jewels. horse, the finest I ever saw, had very tich harness, plated with solid gold. prince is between 40 and 50 years of age. In a word, he is one of the extraordinary persons who make an indelible impression on those who have seen him. It is a pity that he is surrounded by persons whose minds and understandings are not sufficiently elevated to second his views; all foreigners in Persia agree in doing him justice.

His most earnest desire is to enlighten his people, but for this he wants energy, and the people Christianity. Prejudice opposes every thing that might be undertaken.'

Ausplasia.

NEW SOUTH WALES

Papers from this colony to August 3d have reached us.

A report is mentioned that, in consequence of the natives in the vicinity of Hunter's River having become extremely troublesome, many persons have resolved to poison them, and that corrosive sublimate, as one mode of destruction, has in several instances, been provided for the purpose. We should hope that such a diabolical scheme was never seriously thought of.

A judgment of the supreme court has decided that the government cannot reclaim an assigned servant, that is, a convict assigned to a particular individual for a term, or for life. The court held, that under the act 5th Geo. IV. c. 84 the property of the assigned prisoner vested solely in the individual to whom he was assigned, and that the government could not take him away. The governor has, nevertheless, issued a government notice, stating, that he is empowered by the act to remove and re-assign servants, and shall continue to do so on proper grounds.

The influenza (a species of catarrh) has carried off many persons, including some of the oldest of the emigrant colonists. It appears to be making the circuit of the colony; it is less severely felt at Sydney than in other parts.

An estate was offered for sale at Sydney. in July last, in one of the finest parts of New South Wales, consisting of a highly improved farm, of 6,500 acres, together with 2,000 wether sheep, 3,000 ewes. 1.100 lambs, 150 rams, 200 oxen; all for the sum of £20,000 sterling, and half the ewes would lamb in six weeks.

VAN DIEMEN'S LAND.

From the Hobart Town papers we extract the following particulars:-

The Bush rangers and the blacks continue their respective depredations, and keep the colony in constant alarm. latter carry slaughter and devastation wherever they appear. The Colonial Times of July 6 has the following extract of a letter from Launceston:—" The people over the second Western Tier have killed an immense quantity of the blacks this last week, in consequence of their having murdered Mr. Simpson's stock-keeper. were surrounded whilst sitting round their fires, when the soldiers and others fired at them when about thirty yards distant They report that there must be about sixty of them killed and wounded! They found muskets, cartridges, loose balls and powder. tomahawks, sheep shears, and an immense number of other articles of various descriptions. The man they murdered was formerly an associate of the blacks at Sydney, although himself a white man,"

The value of imports into Van Diemen's Land, during the year 1826, amount altogether to £99,747, while those of 1825 were £76,406 making an increase of £23,311. The exports during the same period were £41,498, and in 1825,£20,659. making an increase of £23,839.

The increase in the population of Van Diemen's Land, during the last year, may at a fair computation be taken at 1,000 With the military, the whole may be computed at between 15,000 and 16,000.

INDIAN SECURITIES AND EXCHANGES.

Calcutta, Sept. 13, 1827. Government Securities.

Buy. ] Rs. As. Buy. J Rs. As. | Sell. Prem. 26 0 Remittable Loan 6 per ct. 25 0 Prem. Disc. 0 3 Five per ct. Loan 0 8 Disc. New 5 per cent. Loan 0 3 Disc. Pat. News per cent. Dam. O 3 Disc.
Rates of Exchange.
On London, 6 months sight, — to buy Is. 11d. — to self Is. 14d, per strea Rupee.
On Madras, 40 days' dutto, 92 to 96 Sicca Rupees per 100 Madras Rupees.
On Bombay, dutto, 86 Sicca Rupees per 100 Bombay Rupces.

Bank Shares.—Prem.—to buy 5,300—to sell 5,100.

· Madras, Sept 12, 1827.

Government Securitie Government Securities.
Six per cent, Bengal Remittable Loan,
He Rate of Subscription, etc. 359
Madras Rs. per 335 54, Rs. 28 P.
At a Kate prevailing among Merchants and Bookers in bij ing and selling Publie Securities, w., 106 Madras Rs. per 20 P. 28 Prem ...26 Prem. Five per cent. Bengal Unremittable Loan. At the Rate of Subscription, no. 350 Madras Rs. per 335 Sa. Rs. . . . . . . . § Pr At the Rate prevailing among Merchants and Brokers in buying and selling Pub-lie Securities, viz. 1064 Madras Rs. per 100 Sa. Rs.

> Bombay, Sept. 29, 1827. A Five per cent. Loan open.

On London, at 6 months light, 1s. 83d. per Rapec. On Calcutta, at 30 days' sight, 106 Bom. Rs. per 100 Sicca Rupecs. On Madras, at 50 days' sight, 993 Bom. Rs. per 100 Madras Rs.

Singapore, Sept. 1, 1827.

Exchange. Gov. Bills on Bengal, at 30 days' sight, per 100 Sp. 10-., 207 Sic. Rs. Private Bills on ditto—none. Private Bills on London, per Sp. Ds. 4s. 2d.

SUPPLEMENT TO ASIATIC INTELLIGENCE.

Calcutta.

CIVIL APPOINTMENTS.

Political Department.

Aug. 17. Mr. G. R. Clark to be first assistant to resident at Delhi and agent to governor general for affairs of Rappootana.

Lieut. Win. Hislop to be 2d-assistant to ditto

Hon, R. F. Moore to be assistant to superinten-dent and political agent at Ajmere.

dent and pointed agent at Ajinere. 24. Sir Jas. Edw. Colebrooke to be resident and commissioner at Delhi, and agent to governor ge-neral for affairs of Rajpootana

Territorial Department.

Aug. 23. Mr. W. R. Jennings to be collector of Patna

Mr. J. Lowis, to be ditto of Tipperah.

Mr. W. Dampier to be commissioner in Sunderbunds. 24. Mr. W. S. Alexander to be assistant to magistrate and to collector of Saharunpoor.

BIRTHS, MARRIAGES, AND DEATHS.

BIRTHS.

July 28. At Meerut, the lady of Capt. Luard, 11 M. Stoth Laurets, of a son, 4g. 9. At Agra, the lady of Lieut. Ripley, 2d Europ. Regt., of a daughter.
10 A Berhampore, the Lady of Lieut. Clayton, sub-assit, our, gen., of a son.

— At Dacca, Mrs. C. Leonard, of a daughter.
11. At Bacca, the lady of G. C. Weguehn, Esq.,

of a son-

of a son.

12. At Monghyr, the lady of H. P. Russell, Esta, rivil service, of a son.

— At Cawipore, the lady of Capt. Thos. Sanbroni, with Cav., of a son.

13. At Berhampore, Mrs. Pennyquick, younger, of Soilarie, of a daughter.

— Mrs. F. La Valette, of a daughter.

13. Mrs. A. Rodrigues, of a daughter.

14. Mrs. A. Rodrigues, of a daughter.

15. At Dinapore, the lady of Capt. Hawthorne,
dep. assist, adi, gen., Dinapore division, of a son.

— At Barrackpore, the lady of Lieut. R. Taylor, 6th N.l., of a son.

20. At Titalya, the lady of Capt. Haslam, 25th
N.l., of a son.

20. At Titalya, the lady of Capt. Haslam, 25th N1, of a son.

— Vt Barrackpore, the lady of Maj. G. Moore, 50th Regt., of a daughter.

22. At Cuttack, the lady of Lieut. Counsell, of a son and her.

— At Mozufterpore, Tirhoot, the lady of J. E. Wilkinson, Esq., civil service, of a daughter.

23. Vt Poorneah, the lady of Lieut, and Adj. F. B. Confield, of a son.

— The lady of the late Thos. Thomson, Esq., of a daughter.

of a daughter.

24. At Chowringhee, the lady of H. Lushington, Evq., of a daughter 25. At Ballygunge, the lady of T. R. Davidson,

M Ballygunge, the rasy o.
 Fster, of a daughter.
 Att Schampore, Mrs. Swan, wife of the Rev.
 T. Awan, Scrampore College, of a son.
 Mrs. E. Stark, of a daughter.
 Attomillah, the lady of G. P. Thompson, Ean. of a daughter.

At Comillah, the lady of G. P. Thompson, E.q., of a daughter.

29. The lady of C. G. Strettell, Esq., of a son.— Mrs. R. Gordon, of a son.

30. Mrs. J. Rodrigues, of a daughter. Sp. L. Mrs. T. Jones, of a daughter.

2. At Chowringhee, Mrs. C. K. Robinson, of a

3. The lady of Capt. S. Lee, of a daughter.

The lady of E. Trotter, Esq., of a son.

Ulessore, the lady of B. Golding, Esq., of a daughter

8. The lady of C. D'Verinne, Esq., of a daugh-12. At Chowringhee, the lady of Maj. P. M.

Hay, of a son.

MARRIAGES.

MARRIAGES.

June 27. At Benares, Maj. J. H. Littler, 14th
N.I., to Helen Olympia, only child of the late Capt. H. Stewart, H.J.
everyiee,
Aug. 2. At Poornea, everyiee,
Planter, to Miss. J. I. Cumming,
12. At Chandernagore, and on the 14th at Calcutta, Thos. Clarke, Esq., 11.C.'s marine, to Miss E. F. Deshrusdas.
13. Win. Montgomerie, Esq., assist. surg., to Eliza, second daughter of Alex. Graham, Esq., of Glasrow.

Eliza, second daughter of Alex. Graham, Esq., of Glasgow.

18. At Benares, Lleut. F. Minchin, 47th Madras N.I., to Emily, third daughter of J. Griffin, Esq., Sloane Street, Chelsea.

20. Capt. G. A. Bruce to Miss Eliz. Masters.

21. The Rev. G. J. Laurle, Madras Presidency, to Laura Louisa, second daughter of S. Ludlow, Esq., residency surg., Delhi.

— At Baltool, Lleut. K. Campbell, interp. and qu. mast. 45th N.I., to Miss M. A. Read.

22. H. Clarke, Esq., to Helena Eliza, daughter of T. Barfoot, Esq.

23. At Humeerpoor, W. M. Benson, Esq., civil service, to Maria, third daughter of C. Scott, Esq., of the Comment of the Lex. Capt. R. M. Owen.

29. At Berhampore, Mr. Jas. Archer, of Ruttengunge, to Miss. S. K. Poole, of Banleah. Sept. 5. A. F. Smith, Esq., to Josephina, widow of the late Alex. Falconer, Esq., 8. Licut. C. B. Lelcester, 34th Bengal N.I., to Miss Emily Leycester.

DEATHS.

Aug. 3. At Cawnpore, Mr. R. Foley. 6. Alexander, youngest son of Mr. John Ma-

6. Alexander, youngest son of Mr. John Ma-much, aged 11 years.
9. At Fendal Baug, Mary Ann, daughter of the late Rev. S. Trawin, aged eight years.
13. At Bishnauth, in Assam, Lieut L. Vansan-dan, 68th Bengal N.I., and second in command of the Rungpore Light Infantry.
14. At Entally, Miss Eliza Alfred, aged 12 years.
— At Dacca, Mrs. C. Leonard.
18. Mrs. White, wife of Mr. T. White, musician, aged 27.

and Miss writes and a Trimber measuring aged 27.
21. At Akyah, the laizabeth, daughter of Mr. M. Robertson, aged 23.
25. Mr. Jas. Schmidt, aged 30.
26. Mrs. Polhill, wife of Mr. Wm. Polhill, sub-assistant revenue surveyor, aged 17.

27. At Sulkca, Mr.W. Hughes, shipwright, aged 40.

40.

Mr. Wm. Tomkyns, son of Lleut. Col. J.
Tomkyns, late of the Bengal artillery, aged 42.

Wilham, son of Mr. Wm. Patton, aged 12.

Mr. J. L. Maclean, of cholera.

— Mr. J. L. Maclean, of cholera.
29. Mr. Ww. Havdon, assistant to Messrs. Middleton and Co., jewellers.
31. At Chittagong, of jungle fever, Lieut. Wm. Dickson, executive engineer, eldest son of Col. Str Alex. Dickson, K.C.B., &C., aged 23.

— John B. Long, E-94., aged 24.

— At Chandernagore, John Dechal, Esq., aged

Sept. 1. Elizabeth, wife of Mr. T. Jones, aged

3. At Berhampore, on his way to Benares, Lieut. Col. J. L. Stuart, of the Bengal army.

Madras.

CIVIL APPOINTMENTS.

Aug. 31. C. M. Bushby, Esq., to be register to Provincial Court of Appeal and Circuit for centre division.

S. Clarke, Esq., to be register to zillah Court

The Rev. W. T. Blenkinsop, to be military chap-lain at St. Thomas's Mount.

BIRTHS, MARRIAGES, AND DEATHS.

Aug. 15. In camp, Jaulnah, the lady of Lieut. Col. Hackett, of twin daughters. 25. At Palamoottah, the lady of Major Williamsan, 3d L. Inf., of a son. 26. At Bangalore, the lady of Lieut. C. H. Grøme, of a son.

Græme, of a son.

sept. 3. At Belgaum, lady of Capt. J. Wal-lace, postmater, Donab division, of a son.
4. At Bangalore, the lady of Capt. Buchanan, 1st L. C., of a son.

MARRIAGES.

July 31. At Hyderabad, J. A. Moore, Esq., of H.H. the Nizaur's service, to Sophia Stewart, second daughter of Lieut Col. R. II. Yates, been the Madras estab.

Sept. 3. Lieut. J. F. Musgrove, 36th N.I., to Mary Caroline, only daughter of the late T. R. Stockalle, Esq., formerly of the Madras artillery, 14. J. II. Swinhoe, Esq., of Calcutta, to Jessey, youngest daughter of the late R. Trowman, Esq., of Syster. Leg.

of Exeter, Devon.

BEATHS.

June 11. At Kamptee, Capt. R. Gordon, 8th

Aug. 27. At Royapettah, Elizabeth, wife of Mr. F. Aubert, aged 21.
28. Mr. C. Preston, proprietor of the Carnatic

26. Al. C. Preston, proprietor of the Carnatic Hotel, aged 43. 29. At Vepery, Mrs. M. Green, widow of the late Adj. J. Green, 2d Nat. Vet. bat.

Bomban.

CIVIL APPOINTMENTS.

Judicial Department.

Sept. 1. Mr. H. Borradaile to be senior assistant to judge and session judge of Ahmednuggur for Candeish.

Mr. P. W. Le Geyt to be acting senior ditto ditto.

Mr. Erskine to be assistant ditto ditto.

Mr. E. Montgomerie to be senior assistant to judge and criminal judge in Northern Concan.

Mr. D. A. Biane to be 1st assistant to judge and session judge of Poonah; to be stationed at Sholapore.

Mr. C. Warden to be 2d senior assistant to judge and session judge of Poonali-

MILITARY APPOINTMENTS, PROMOTIONS, &c.

Bombay Custle, Aug. 30, 1827.—Cadet C. H. Boye admitted to artill, and prom. to 24-licut.—Cadet T. M. B. Turner admitted to engres, and prom. to 24-li ut.—Cadets E. Gre n. F. Westbrook, A. M. Haselwood, and J. Ramsay admitted to Inf., and prom. to ensigns.—Mr. B. Pitcher admitted as a vereinary surv. a veterinary surg.

Returned to duty, from Europe. May. J. Moor, artillery; Lieut. H.N.Ramsay, 34th N.I.; Assist. Surg. Stewart, all arrived 28th Aug. 1827.—Assist. Surg. D. Fallon, arrived 27th ditto.

Aug 31.—21st N.I. Ens. S. J. Stevens to be lieut., v. Beck dec.; dated 21st Aug. 1827.

Sept. 4.—2d Gren. N.I. Ens. D. Manoe to be lieut., v. Hardy dec.; dated 13th Nov. 1826.

Sept. 13.—18th N.I. Lieut. E. E. M. Willoughby to be capt., and Ens. R. T. Steplienson to be lieut., in suc. to Addison invalided.

Sept. 14.—1st-Licut. H. Turner, of engineers, to be acting executive engineer at Surat and Broach. 2d-Lieut. F. Pelly to be assistant to executive engineer at Poona.

Sept. 15.—Capt. A. Grafton, surveyor in Deccan, placed at disposal of Com. in chief for purpose of employment with Dooab Field Force.

Sept. 19.—16th N.I. Lieut. H. Hopkins to be adj., v. Hunter.

let Extra Bat. Li be adj., v. Hopkins. Lieut. C. Hunter, 16th N.I., to Brig. Maj. P. D. Ottey to accompany troops from Poonsh under orders for field service, in that capacity, and to have charge of basar department.

Lieut. A. Woodburn, 35th N.I., to perform du-es of interp. to 4th light bat. ordered on field service.

Licut. H. N. Ramsay, 24th N.I., to act as qu. mast. and interp. in Hindoostanee to 1st extra bat., during absence of Lieut. A. Woodburn on field service

Capt. T. Roe to take charge of Assist.adj.gen.'s filce, Guicowar Subsid. Force, during absence of Capt. T. Leighton.

Lieut. W. Cavaye, 21st N.I., to act as dep. assist-qu.mast.gen., and Lieut. Prior, of same regt., to take charge of ordnance department in Cutch, during absence of Lieuts. Barnes and Stanton on duty at Baroda.

Lieut. H. Cracklaw to be acting adj. to wing of 22d N.I., proceeding to Belgaum.

Lieut. John Davies, 11th N.I., to perform duties of commissariat with troops proceeding from Poonah on field service.

Sept. 21.—Lieut. B. Turner, executive engineer at Surat and Broach, placed at disposal of Com.-in-chief, for service with field ordered to proceed from Poonali.

Sept. 22.—12th N.I. Lieut. C. H. Johnson to be capt., and Ens. J. Holmes to be lieut., in suc. to Cazalet dcc.

Cadets R. N. Meade, G. F. Sympson, E. R. Elwall, H. Cotgrave, and H. S. Hutchinson, admitted to infantry, and prom. to ensigns.—Mr. H. J. Campbell admitted. s an assist. surg.

Sapt. 24.—Lieut. Mant to take charge of executive engineer's department at Surat and Broach; dated 3d Sept.

Sept. 25.—Lieut. D. C. Graham, 19th N.I., to be adj. of Bheel corps in Kandersh, vacated by the death of Lieut. Beck.

BIRTHS, MARRIAGES, AND DEATHS.

Aug. 13. Mrs. Jefferics, of a daughter. 29. At Surat, the lady of W. Stubbs, Esq., of a daughter.

a daugnter.

Sept. 5. At Poonah, the lady of Licut. Rac, 11.M.'s 20th regt., of a daughter.

6. The lady of Licut. Col. Hardy, qu. mast.
gen., of a son.

9. The lady of Jas. Dewar, Esq., barrister at w, of a son.

11. At Colabah, Mrs. Biowers, of a daughter.

12. The lady of Lieut. Col. F. H. Pierce, horse

artil., of a son.
16. At Belgaum, the lady of J. Hobson, Esq.,

1st Europ. Regt., of a daughter.
21. At Tannah, the lady of W. Simson, Esq.,

The lady of G. Adam, Esq., of a son.

23. The lady of Licut. Burnett, 2d Europ.

MARRIAGES.

Sept. 5. Mr. Jas. Brown, conductor H.C.'s pension estab., to Miss M. T. Bryce.
24. At Rutageree, Capt. R.O. Meriton, 2d Bombay Europ. Regt., to Margaret Elizabeth, only daughter of P. Elhot, Esq., M.D., Neath, Glamorganshire.

DEATHS.

Aug. 3. At Asseergurh, Licut. and Adj. W. F. Barlow, 23d N.I. 11. Frisign Puggald Campbell, 2d Europ. Regt. 21. Licut. Col. Read, deputy quart. mast. gen. H.M.'s forces

Sept. 3. At Mhow, Lieut. H. H. Doherty, 18th

At Colabah, of apoplexy, Capt. W. C. Clarke,
 Mr. S. 6th regt., commanding depot of King's troops, Bombay.
 Latety. Capt. Wim. Cazalet, 12th N.I.

MISCELLANEOUS.

January 29th.

Bombay papers to the beginning of October have just reached us, which contain intelligence from Calcuta up to the 13th September. Besides the accounts respecting Kolapore, the substance of which is inserted in a preceding page, there is scarcely any thing to add to our previous stock of news from Bengal. Lord Amherst had arrived at Mirzapore, and Lord Combernere was about to set out on a tour of inspection to the Upper Provinces. Sir C. T. Metcalfe was sworn in a provisional member of the Supreme Council on the 24th August.

An extract from the Calcutta Government Gazette of Sept. 6 contains an account of the assassination of Mr. Stephens, principal assistant to the agent of the Gov .gen, on the Nerbudda, at Sconce, August 17. It appears that two Mahomedans were brought before Mr. Stephens, in his judicial capacity, charged with having entered a man's house at Chupparah, in prosecution of an intrigue with his wife, when they were detected by the woman's brother, and sent under guard to Sconee, After investigating the case, Mr. Stephens declared his purpose of sentencing the offenders to a term of confinement; when one snatched up a dagger, and wounded Mr. Stephens deep below the left ribs. The other, seizing a tulwar (several of which weapons were in court), wounded the moonshee slightly. The culprits then attempted to escape, but were pursued, and killed by the police peans. Mr. Stephens expired the same night about ten o'clock. His loss is much regretted, as he was not only an active officer, but had won the regard and confidence of the natives in his jurisdiction.

The Birmese ambassadors, who had visited Calcutta, returned to Rangoon by way of Amherst and Moalmein. During their residence at the latter place, arrangements were concerted by them, with Sir Archibald Campbell, for the payment of the remaining instalments, and it was finally determined, that the payment of the third should commence on the 4th of September, and be completed within two months from that date; and the payment of the fourth should commence on the 31st of August, in the the lawing year.

Australian papers to the 17th of August have also reached us. Mr. Cunningham had returned from his expedition into the interior, without making any discovery.

The Tasmanian contains particulars of some serious occurrences on board the ship Harvy, which had arrived at the colony. A detachment of the 55th regiment had embarked on board the ship from England for the Cape, under Capt. Elrington. Mr. Williams, an English barrister, and Mr. Noble, a nephew of D'Arcy Wentworth, of Sydney, were passengers; and in consequence of a misunderstanding between these gentlemen and some of the officers of the 55th, Mr. Williams was challenged, on the arrival of the Harvey at the Cape, by Lieuts, Bonnis, Wilson, and Peck, of the 55th, in succession. He accepted all, and one of the officers was wounded by him. Lient, Wilson then challenged Mr. Noble, who wounded him slightly. Mr. Noble was then challenged by Lieut. Bonnis, who, at the first fire, was shot through the temple, and expired. Mr. Williams and Mr. Noble were tried for murder, by the Dutch law, and acquitted, for want of proof that the duel took place. A military court of inquiry into these occurrences was held at the Cape, the result of which was that Capt. Elrington was sent to England under arrest. Such is the extraordinary statement in the Van Diemen's Land paper.

Letters from Batavia of the 6th October state that the negociations which followed the armistice with the native powers had been broken off; the chief, Nepo Negoro, having insisted on conditions which the Dutch authorities deemed it utterly impossible to accede to.

HOME INTELLIGENCE.

LAW.

COURT OF KING'S BENCH, January 17.

Manton v. Mills.—This was an action by Mr. Joseph Manton, the celebrated gun-maker, against the defendant, a gun-maker in High Holborn, to recover damages for a fraudulent exportation of certain fowling-pieces and pistols marked with the name of the plaintiff, which were not of his manufacture.

The facts of the case were these:--In May 1824, a large quantity of fowling-pieces and pistols was shipped by the defendant on board the Pyramus, for India. The value set upon them by the defendant was so low, that a searcher at the Customhouse suspected they could not be of the plaintiff's manufacture, though marked with his name. He accordingly made a communication to the plaintiff, who, accompanied by Mr. Mortimer, Mr. Bond, and other gun-makers, inspected the articles, and found them to be of a spurious manufacture. The plaintiff endcavoured to prevent their exportation, but they were subsequently taken to India, and sold as the plaintiff's manufacture. On the part of the defendant, it was attempted to be proved that the exportation was on account of a Mr. Sumner, and that defendant was merely his agent.

The jury found a Verdict for the plaintiff, damages £25.

MISCELLANEOUS.

NEW GOVERNOR OF THE CAPE OF GOOD HOPE.

Lieutenant-General the Hon. Sir Galbraith Lowry Cole, G.C.B., is appointed Governor and Commander-in-chief of the settlement of the Cape of Good Hope. -[Lond. Gaz., Jan. 11.

NEW GOVERNOR OF THE MAURITIUS.

Lieutenant-General the Hon. Sit Chas. Colville, G.C.B., is appointed Governor and Commander-in-chief of the island of Mauritius .- [ Ibid.

EAST-INDIA PRIZE MONFY.

A second distribution of the Deccan prize money will shortly take place. A first distribution of the Bhurtpore prize money will also, it is understood, take place forthwith. It is reported that after the deduction of one-eighth as Lord Combermere's share, each subaltern will receive about £300.

THE " GENFRAL PALMER."

The General Palmer, Capt. Truscott, left St. Helens on the 12th January, for Madras and Calcutta, with the wind to the S. and E. At 6 o'clock on the next morning, when about fifteen miles off Portland, the ship wore, laid with her head off the land, and scarcely brought to the wind on the larboard tack, when a sudden gust carried away her masts at the same instantthe mainmast in the cuddy, the others close to her deck. The wreck was cleared as soon as possible, in this perilous condition (the tiller-rope having broken twice), and a small sail was hoisted on a boat's mast, by which she was got before the wind, and succeeded in reaching St. Helens in safety. The vessel is teak-built, and remarkable for her speedy voyages.

PROMOTIONS AND CHANGES IN THE BRITISH ARMY

(SERVING IN THE EAST.)

4th L. Drags. Lieut. H. Sharpin, from h.p. 24th. Dr., to be lieut., v. W. Fitz Maurice, who exch. (13 Dec. 27).

2d Foot. Ens. E. L. Daniell to be lieut. by purch., v. Dowglass, who retires (27 Dec. 27).

3d Foot. Capt. H. Gilman to be mal., v. C. Cameron dec. (14 Nov. 27); Capt. A. C. Innes to be maj. by purch., v. A. Cameron mom. (13 Dec.); Lieut. Wm. Mackay to be capt., v. Gillman (14 6th Foot. Lieut. Edw. Thompson, from h.p. 31st F., to be lieut., v. J. R. Heyland app. to 61st F. (9) Dec. 97).

16th Foot. J. F. Proud to be ens. by purch., v. Scott, app. to 76th F. (31 Dec. 27).

20th Foot. Lieut. R. C. Oakley to be capt., v. Langmead dec. (27 Dec. 27).

30th Foot. Ens. R. C. Macdonald, from 99th F., to be lieut. by purch., v. Ralph prom. (13 Dec. 27). 39th Foot. Ens. M. Spencer to be lieut. by purch., v. Waldron prom. (8 Jan. 28).

54th Foot. Lieut. J. Henderson, from h.p. 1st L. Inf. Bat. King's Germ. Leg., to be lieut., v. Jas. G. Halle, who exch. (13 Dec. 27).

Allowed to dispose of their half-pay. Ens. C. Campbell, 39th F.; 2d-Lieut, J. W. Bennett, 3d Ceylon Regt. (both 8 Jan. 28).

INDIA SHIPPING.

Arivals.

Dec. 29. Fatth, Deloite, from N. S. Wales 5th Aug.; at Falmouth.—31. Two Bothers, Meek, from Batava 5th Sept.; at Portsmouth.—Jan. 2. Bio neo, Haviland, from Bencolen 18th Aug., Mauritius 24 Oct., and Cape 8th Nov.; and Sarah, Manders, from the Mauritius 13th Sept.; both at Deal.—7. Codstream, Stephens, from Bengal 18th July, and Madras 3lst Aug.; off the Wight.—13. Cassanders, Rogers, trom Bengal 25th July; at Deal.—3b. O. Alboni, Chambers, from the Mauritius 9th Ott; off Pool.—16. Harray, Kindley, from Bengal 18th July, and Mauritius 12th Ott; at Pot-Ismouth.—19. Lord 8th angiond, Grey, from the Mauritius 18th Ott; at Cowes.—20. Cognitius, 18th On. 18th Aug., and Mauritius 18th July, and Sala 18th July, and Mauritius 18th Nov.; both at Grave-end.—21. Consected 18th Sept., and Batavia 30th dos. prof. Surgadoe 8th Sept., and Batavia 30th dos. prof. Surgadoe 8th Sept., and Sala 18th Aug., and Cape 16th Nov.; both at Grave-end.—24. Consected.—24. Danne, Blair, from the Mauritius, 3d Nova, at Cape 16th Nov.; both at Grave-end.—25. Consected.—24. Danne, Blair, from the Mauritius, 3d Nova, at Cape 16th Nov.; both Sept., and Ascension 14th Dec.; off Portsmouth, —140, St. Formiot, Rutherford, from Bengal 16th Sept., and Ascension 14th Dec.; off Portsmouth, —140, St. Formiot, Rutherford, from Bengal 16th Sept.; off Dover.—280. Bubava, Pleaston, from the Cape 18th Nov.; at Deal.—26. Palumbun, Nash, from Bombay 16th Sept.; and Comp. Baird, from ditto 4th Oct.; both at Greenock.

Baird, from ditto 4th Oct.; both at Greenock.

Dec. 29. Duneam Gibb, McIntosh, and Annandale, Penn, both for Bombay; from Liverpool.—
30. Anaham, Wells, for Bengal, and Mary, Dugnes, for the Mauritius; both from Liverpool.—
2010. Anaham, Wells, for Bengal, and Mary, Dugnes, for the Mauritius; both from Liverpool.—
2010. Secondary, Paterson, for Bombay; Jews
Linuson, Church, for V. D. Land; Julia, Grant, for the Mauritus; Marqueetha, Reed, for Batavia; and Dunna, Hamilton, for Bombay and Clima; all from Deal,—also, Galloudan, Martin, for Bombay; from Liverpool.—6. Lady Holland, Snell, for Madras and Bengal; Madras, Beatl, for ditto; Lady Julies, for ditto; and H.M.'s ships Mautstone and Hasty for Cape and Mauritius; all from Portsmouth,—also, Wilmon,
Young, tor Bengal; Methana, Miller, for Bombay, Purtland, Mood, for N. S. Wales; and Walzungham, Bourke, for St. Helena; all from Deal
2010. General Pather, Truscott, for Madras and Bengal; from Portsmouth—ils, Grenola Pather, Truscott, for Madras and Bengal; from Portsmouth (since returned)
11. General Pather, Truscott, for Madras and Bengal; from Portsmouth (since returned)
11. General Pather, Truscott, for Madras and Bengal; from Portsmouth (since returned)
11. General Pather, Truscott, for Madras and Bengal; from Green Horis, Stanton, for St.
Helena, Bengal, and China; both from Deal.—10. Ceres, Warren, for Bomhay; Sammety, Sunth, for the Mauritius; and Sarah, Batteman, for V. D.
Land and N. S. Wales; all from Deal,—also Mangeles, Carr, for Dubin and N. S. Wales (with convicts); from Gravescul,—also, Jane Haddow, Hamilton, for Bengal; from Greenock,—also,
Faith, Robertson, for the Mauritius; from Liverpool.—19. Witha, Talit, for Cape of Good Hope; from Deal.—27. Elizabeth, Grant, for Ceylon and Bengal.

PASSENGERS FROM INDIA.

Per Seppings, from Ceylon and Mauriths: Capt. H. Rose, late of the Clydesdale; Lieut. Jackson.

Per Faith, from N. S. Wales: Mr. Daugar; Mr. Cory; Mr. Cope; Mrs. Shannon and two diplifren; Miss Haigh; Mr. Hunt.

dibblen; Miss Hagn; Mr. Hunt.

Pol. Obstream, from Bengal and Madras; J.Line,
Fost, merchant; Mr. Marriott; Major Lyuch,
H.M.5,96h regt., incharge of invalids; Caut. Enteror. H.M.5 48th do.; Eleut. Layard and Lieut.
Lobes, H.M.5 88th do.; Lieut. Bayls; H.G.

at Hery; Lieut. Longworth, Lient. Flyter, Leut.
Robertson, Lieut. Kennedy, and Lieut. Durant,
M.J. Sand, M. Sand, M. Sand, M. Sand, M. Sand,
M. Sand, M. Sand, M. Sand,
M. Sand, M. Sand,
M. Sand, M. Sand,
M. Sand, M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. Sand,
M. San

Per Cussandra, from Bengal: Mrs. Smith and mo children; Mr. E. Williams.

Per Oryatha, from Singapore: Capt. Thompson, late of the ship Loretto, and four of the crew, Master M'Kenz'e.

crex, Master Wichles.

Per M. Leman, from Bengal: Lient, Col. Free M. Leman, from Bengal: Lient, Col. Free M. Bengal army; Mr. Newmarch, surgeon; Mr. Microa, dutto; Lient, Smith, 45th legt; Capt, Davson, late of the sh-p Nonthumbom; Mr. Hawkens; Miss L. Plumb; two servants; four of the view of the Nonthumbom.

Per Horneo, from Bencoolen; Miss S. Boyesand 'servant; Master and Miss Nash, and servant.

PASSENGIERS TO INDIA.

PASSYNGERS TO ISBIA.

P., Dorman, for Bombay and Chuar; Mr. C.,
Carkand Mr. F.S. Morris, witers, for Bombry;
W. C. Margore, Mr. W. R. Morris; Messrs G.
Garrismonigh and John Buckle, volunteers, Bornis, Carlott, W. Roper, R. W. Herne, H. C. Jones,
T. Spers, E. Pottinger, A. F. Roxaen, J. Walkros, and R. Wallice, cadets for Borisbay; Capter, Everest and Campbell, H. M.; Service;
Leett. Patterson, datto: Ensigns Schnell, Knight, Bady, and Ralph, datto; 250 soldness LUA, Sl and olyregts of foot, 30 soldness wives; 31 childenot datto. dienot ditto.

dienof diffo.

p. (anexil Harris), for St. Helena, Bengal, and China. Mr. J. J. Eastwood, volunteer Bengal, Joff, Mr. A. V. Smith, endet, for St. Helena; capt Johnson, in charge of recrusts; Assist. Singhighs, for Bengal; Mr. A. B. Monris, collect, for Bered, Mrs. Jessep and one child for St. Helena; vec Chiners, 90 Peterics for H.C.S artillery; five solders waves, 3 children of ditto; European serJune S. A.; vants, & G.

vanis, x, C.

"Pro Elizhor, gh., for Bombay and China: Mrs. H., Flowers, Mrs. Valtoni, Maj. W., Gordon: Loud,
L. J. ddell, Lautt, A., Medelan: Lautt, W. A., Cawlard, Ens. G. Gordon; Mr., J. Wykbb, Messas, C. R. Baton, T. P., Maray, H., Rolland, J. R. Keller, A., Manson, and R. Shaw, caldets; 250 861days, H. C. S. everyer; 15 804dert's wives, 6 childays, H. C. S. everyer; 15 804dert's wives, 6 childien of ditto.

dien of ditto.

Der Thomas Coutts, for Bengal and China;
Insens Markenze, Wade, Edwards, vgots, and Dulot, H.W. 183h Foot; Lient, Germandell,
Lient, Weston, E. S. Wilder, and Ens. Campbell,
I.W. Sth. Foot; Lient, Goodwan, H.W.; alstFoot; Capt. Matthew and Lient, Inwine, H.M.; Saft-Foot; Cept. O'Neill, Leutt. Markull, and
Ins. Levis, H.W. Safth, Leutt. Markull, and
Ins. Levis, H.W. Safth, Leutt. Markull, and Ins. Levis, H.W. Safth, Coret; Mrs. Goodwan and child, Mess Goodwan; detachierent of King's Inage, &c.

Dr. Duff.

For Sammetry, for the Mauritius: Mr. and Mrs Hooper.

Pro Convend Polimer, for Madias and Bengal: Ms. Bamester. Messas, Heoper and Harris, ve-turean surgeons; Messas, Johnson, Singlicton, E. T. Cox, Wake, Cocklum, Humbleton, Je myn, and Finster, cadets; Mr. Atkinson.

Per Lady Holland, for Madras and Bengal: Mr. Holis, Mr. Savi; Mr. Muriay; Mr. Peacock; Mr. Rogers; Mr. Clarke.

MISCELLANFOUS NOTICES.

The Laretta, Thomson, from Sugapore to London, grounded on a sheal near Carlmata in 1.1. P. J. S. on the 8th August Last, and all endeavours to get her off proved truttless. On the 12th the .lardic Journ. Vol. 25. No. 146.

master and crew took to their boats, and returned to Singapore on the 20th. Immediately on their quitting the vessel, sho was taken possession of by six material prabus.

The Hussaran, Gibson, from the Cape of Good Hope to London, is totally lost in Pagwell Bay, on the Sandwich Sand. Part of the cargo saved.

The Jessie Lawson, Church, for Van Diemen's Land, was driven on the rocks in Batten Bay, on the morning of the 13th January.

one morning of the (3II) January.

The Claudine, Flynn, bound for Madras and Bengal, cut away her main and mizen masts during the gale on the morning of the 13th Jan., in Knob's Hole, Queen's Chanuel, and was obliged to return to Gravesend to refit.

BIRTHS, MARRIAGES, AND DEATHS.

Dec. 29. In Cadogan Place, the lady of Capt. E. M. Damell, of the Hon. F. I. Campany's service. Jan. 2. At the East-India College, the lady of Capt. Mechael, of a son. 5. At Glasgow, the Lady of Claude Currie, Esq., surgeon Madias anny, of a son.

MARRINGES

Dec. 24. At Edmburgh, L. M. Kert, Esq., of the Hon. E. I. Company's service, to Marlanne, daughter of the late Capt, John Whyle, R.N. 24. At Edmburgh, H. R. Chaplan, Esq., sur-go on, Lavenham, Suffolk, to Isdella, daughter of the late Major C. Grant, of the East-India of the late Major C. Grant, of the East-India Company's Service.

Jan. 10. At St. Panetas New Church, J. Patch, Esq., of the Middle Temple, barrister-at-law, to Hope, elast denging of the Hon, E. I. Cempany's service.

17. At Ethnburgh, Alex. Henderson, Esq., surgeon on the Bombey establishment, to Agnes, youngest denginer of Chas. Scott, Esq., of Muray Place, Edinburgh.

DEATHS.

Dec. 24. Mrs. Ayers, wife of S. H. Ayers, Esq., of Nexangton Place, Kennington.

25. At Blactheath, Mrs. Labas Straver, wife of Colorel Strover, of the Bombay establishment, ag 4.

At Edminuth, Maj. Gen. E. S. Broughton, of Research Intellecture overnor of the Island of St. Holmon, and the Late Leave Colored St. Holmon, and the Late Colored St. Late Color

26. At Knightsbillige, John Frederick Kirster, erond son of Capt. T. D. Binrowes, late 8th He sas

d. M Stirling, Lieut, Cluke, lite of the 40th

.3. A String, Licut, Clurke, the of the sum legt at book.

John, L. At Boulogue, Win, Broomfield, Esq., late is go of the Poli Foot.

6. In Upper George Street, Portman Square, Lady Richardson, i.l.et of Sir George Richard-son, Bart, Jounetly of the East-India Company's service set are.

10. In Picadully, St. G. Ardley, E.q., late surgeon of H.M.S. th Regenent of Intanay.
12. At Markken Heise, Parth Jare, Jane Isab, Ha, youngest daughter of the Inte Capt. P. Hinter, or the Hon. E. I. Cona, myServ.cc.
13. In Henriett Street, Cavendish Squite, Those Coates, Esq. of Lipwood, Northumber, Land, and cf. the Hen. E. I. Company's serv.cc.
14. At Amarkon, Berks, Ms. Phallips, widow of the late Mr. Joseph Philips, missionary to Java, in her 35.0 bect.

m her 35th year. 18. At Brompton, Lieut, Gen. Hemy de Castro, aged 77, upwaeds of 49 years of which were spent in the Hon. E. I. Company's indicay service in hadia.

19. Frederick Forbes, of Christ Chinich, Oxford, youngest son of John Underwood, Est, of Glemesker Place, Portmur San ac, agod th. Lattly. On his prise et a England, C. I. Estury, Est, latt mayeten of government lands and woods at the Cape of Good Hope.

— Drowned at act, or his passage from India, Mr. F. Searth, junt, of Cleikenwell given, rged of the passage from India, Mr. F. Searth, junt, of Cleikenwell given, rged

2.3 At Brussels, Gen. Sa G. Sackville Brown, K.C.B.

2 P

GOODS DECLARED FOR SALE AT THE EAST-INDIA HOUSE.

For Sale 12 February-Prompt 9 May.

For Side 12 February - Frompt of Maga-Company's. - Saltpetre. Licensed. - Saltpetre-Pepper-White Pepper-Cloves-Mace-Ginger-Nutmegs - Sago-Cassia Lignes.

Lignes.

Son Sale 14 February—Prompt 9 May.

Licensed.—Camphor—Aloes—Gum Animi—
Bodes—Bellac—Ollhanum—Bees-Wax

Roll Bode—Shellac—Ollhanum—Bees-Wax

Roll Bode—Shellac—Ollhanum—Bees-Wax

Roll Bode—Shellac—Ollhanum—Bees-Wax

Roll Bode—Ocubis Indicus—Nutung Soap—
Castor Seeds—Castor Oll.

For Sale 15 February—Prompt 9 May.

Licensed.—Turmeric—Safflower—Gum Arabic—
Lac Dye—Galls—Sapan Wood.

For Sale 18 February—Prompt 13 June.

Company.—Bengal Raw Silk.

Lucused.—Bengal, China, Canton, and Persian Raw Silk.

For Sale 19 February—Prompt 9 May, Licensed.—Tortoiseshell—Hemp—Paddy Bird Feathers—Tin.

Feathers—1 in:

For Sale 3 March—Prompt 30 May.

Tea. — Bohea, 1,150,000 fb.; Congou, Campoi, Pekoe, and Souchong, 5,200,000 fb.; Twankay and Ityson-Skin, 1,100 (000 fb.; Hyson, 250,00 fb.—
Total, including Private-Trade, 7,700,000 fb.

For Sale 11 March—Prompt 6 June.
Company's—Bengal and Coast Piece Goods, and Callco Wrappers.
Private-Trade.—Silk Piece Goods.

CARGO of EAST-INDIA COM. PANY'S SHIPS lately arrived.

CARGO of the Coldstream, from Fort St. George, Company's.— Blue Cloths — Blue Longcloths — Blue Sallampores—Coffee.

|                                                                       |                                   | 1 4 4                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                          |
|-----------------------------------------------------------------------|-----------------------------------|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| D HOPE.                                                               | Reference for Freight or Passage. | Robert Ford                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                    |
| E of G00]                                                             | Where loading.                    | City Canal   F   City   |
| d of the CAPI                                                         | Captains.                         | Robert Ford City Canal Win Bugg Win Bugg Fants Hunt Win Doy City Canal Win Bugg City Canal Win L Pope Signal Steph J. Faller F. L Dook Steph J. Faller F. L Dook Steph J. Faller F. L Dook Robert Bullen City Canal Mex O'May Win Dibne City Canal Mex O'May Win Doo Win Dibne City Canal Mex O'May Win Doo Win Dibne City Canal Mex O'May Win Doo     |
| LIST of SHIPS trading to INDIA and Eastward of the CAPE of GOOD HOPE. | ou ners or Consignees.            | ## Chair Read ## Robert Ford ## Richard Lloyd ## Richard Read ## Richard ## Richar |
| SHIPS trading t                                                       | Ships Name.                       | rendence  langes  langes  lictory  lict |
| LIST of                                                               | Appointed to sail.                | Ports. 1825 Ports. Feb. Posts. March March Feb. Feb. Feb. Feb. Feb. Feb. Feb. Feb.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                             |
| ,                                                                     | Destination.                      | ngal  mgal  mgal  mbay  mbay  min and Mauritus  mgan Mauritus  mga |

| When                                                                          | 1828.57an.                                 | 15 do.                                                                                                                      |                                                                              |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                 |                                                                                                                                 |                                                                                                                                                             |                                                                                            |                                                                                                                             |                                  |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       |                                                                                                                                                                    |   |
|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------|------------------------------------------------|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|------------------------------------------------------------------------------|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|----------------------------------|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|---|
| Domus. To be the the cad.                                                     | 1828.                                          | 3Dec. 8Jan. 15 do.                                                                                                          | 23 do.                                                                       | 1828.1Jan. 6Feb.                                                                                                                                                                                                            |                                                                                                                                 | 21 do.                                                                                                                                                      |                                                                                            | 7 Mar.                                                                                                                      | 21 do.                           | 20Apr.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         | 19May                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                 | 18Jun                                                                                                                                                              |   |
|                                                                               | 1827.                                          | 3Dec.                                                                                                                       |                                                                              |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                 |                                                                                                                                 | 1Jan. 16do.                                                                                                                                                 |                                                                                            | 16 do. 31 do. 7 Mar.                                                                                                        | 1 Feb. 15 Feb. 21 do.            | 1 Mar. 15 Mar 20 Apr.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                          | 30 do. 14Apr. 19May                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                   | 13May                                                                                                                                                              |   |
| To be Affoat.                                                                 | 1827.                                          | 20/161                                                                                                                      | 3Dec.                                                                        | 18 do.                                                                                                                                                                                                                          | 1888                                                                                                                            | → 1Jan.                                                                                                                                                     |                                                                                            | 16 do.                                                                                                                      | 1 Feb.                           | Mar.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                           | 30 do.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                | 29Apr. 13May 18Jun                                                                                                                                                 |   |
| Consignments.                                                                 | Bombay & China                                 | St. Helena, Ben-                                                                                                            | Bengal & China                                                               | Bengal & China                                                                                                                                                                                                                  | Bombay & China                                                                                                                  | Bengal & China                                                                                                                                              | St. Helena, Bom-                                                                           | Madras & China                                                                                                              | . Maurinus & China               | China                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                          | Madras & Bengal                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       | Bengal                                                                                                                                                             |   |
| Pursers.                                                                      | Francis Burlin J. Giles                        | J. H. Lanyon                                                                                                                | Jas. Beveridge W. MaltmanDavid Scott . T. A. Gibb .                      | Alex. Strling John Lenox. T. Davidson. J. W. Rose Jas. Grant W.S. Spawforth                                                                                                                                                     | Wm. Dallas                                                                                                                      | Henry Arnot · Wm. Ainshe.F. Turner · · J. W. Graham                                                                                                     | Thos. Cron T.Collingwood                                                                   | J. WalkinshawPeter Milne                                                                                                | John Main                        | H. BeverlageR. Dudgeon                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     | Alex. Crowe.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                          | Honey MilletW. I. Irwin                                                                                                                                        |   |
| Surgeons.                                                                     |                                                | G. Braithwaite Henry Burn Jas. M. Baird Thos. N. Were John Millard J. H. Lanyon                                             |                                                                              |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                 | Thos. Sandys Geo. Steward C. Welstead. Rich. H. Cox W. Dickulson Geo. Frampton H. Shepherd. W. Pitcaum. W. Hitchcock Wm. Dallas | Henry Arnot ·                                                                                                                                               | Thos. Cron                                                                                 | F. MacQueen John Pitcaim Chas, Ray. Alex. Marrae J.Walkinsha T.W. Marriott R. Burroughes J. H. Thorn. Geo. Comb Peter Milne | J. Campbell . John Main          | David Forest                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                   | R. Greig                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                              | Edward Voss Wm. Scott ·· Honey MilletG. Abbott ··· R. Renwick ·· W. I. Irwin ··                                                                                |   |
| FourthOfficers                                                                | J. K. Jolly                                    | Thos. N. Were                                                                                                               | R. Saunders                                                                  | A. MacqueenH. DalrympleC. Udale                                                                                                                                                                                         | W. Pitcaim                                                                                                                      | Boulter J. Bell E. Dupuis .                                                                                                                                 | John Willie                                                                                | Chas. Ray                                                                                                                   | S.H. MacauleyR. Howard       | J. G. F. PigotiJas. Jameson                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                | Charles JonesF. Shaw                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                              | Edward Voss                                                                                                                                                        |   |
| Third Officers.                                                               | R. Buckle                                      | Jas. M. Baird                                                                                                               | D. Robertson                                                                 | A PCostobadie A. MacqueenJ.W.Edmonds H. DalrympleSamuel Hyde C. Udale                                                                                                                                                   | Geo. Steward H. Shepherd                                                                                                        | Boulter J. Bell                                                                                                                                             | H. J. Wolfe.                                                                               | John PitcairnR. Burroughes                                                                                              | H. W. ParkerJ. Dalrymple     | G. Creighton O. Richardson                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     | J. R. PiddingG. M. Abbott                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         | M. Murray                                                                                                                                                          |   |
| Second Officers.                                                              | James Rickett                                  | D. MarsnallHenry Burn                                                                                                   | J. Elphinstone D. Robertson R. Saunders D. I. Ward John Rose . P. I. Maywell | R. TaborT. Shepherd.CW Loveridge                                                                                                                                                                                        | I hos. SandysGeo.Frampton                                                                                                   | J. P. Griffiths                                                                                                                                             | John Fenn                                                                                  | F. MacQueenT.W. Marriott                                                                                                | Benj. BaileyHenry Wise       | A. BroadhurstW.K.Packman                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                   | R. M. IsackeHenry Harris                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                          | J. Miller                                                                                                                                                          | - |
| First Officers.                                                               | John Shute James Rickett R. Buckle J. K. Jolly | I.ButtanshawG.Braithwaite                                                                                               | W. Drayner                                                                   | Thos. LeachH. L. ThomasEdw. Jacob                                                                                                                                                                                       | T. J. Dyer . Jas. S. Biles .                                                                                                    | Rees Thomas                                                                                                                                                 | W. Haylett                                                                                 | James SextonGeo. Deudney                                                                                                | N. de St. CroixG. C. Kennedy | T. B. PenfoldA. Rivers                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     | Jas. WilsonR.H.TreherneWm Margur                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                              | W.H.HopkinsH M Sterndale                                                                                                                                       |   |
| Commanders. First Officers. Second Officers. Thard Officers. Fourth Officers. | M. Hamilton                                    | Henry Bax I. Buttanshaw D. Marshau Geo. Waller A follums Joseph Stanton G. Braithwaite Henry Burn Jas. M. Baird Thos. N.Wei | Mex. Chrystie                                                                | J. S. H. Fraser.Fred. MadanChas. S. Timins                                                                                                                                                                              | E. M. DamellJohn Innes                                                                                                      | B. Broughton .                                                                                                                                              | T. Larkins                                                                                 | James Walker James SextonThomas Blair Geo. Deudney                                                                      | Charles StewardThomas Dunkin | Philip Baylis Timothy Smith                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                    | W. E. Farrer Henry Hosmer                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                             | C. E. Mangles W. H. Hopkins — M. Murray Edward Voss Wm. Scott Honey Miller T. F. Badderston H. M. Sterndalel J. Miller J. Conline G. Abbott R. Renwick W. I. Irwin |   |
| Managang Oceners.                                                             | 1325 G. Palmer                                 | 1263 James Sims · · · Joseph Stanton                                                                                        | 1334 S. Marjoribanks Alex. Chrystie. W. Drayner.                             | Marqua of Huntly 1279 I. Mar Taggart J. S. H. Frasker. (Thos. Leach. R. TaborBernotekhire I.1325. Marjornalisk Fred. Madan H. L. Thomas R. ShepherdRetonsee 1135 John F. Timins Chas. S. Timins Edw. Jacob (W. Lovering | 1330 W. E. Feriers E. M. Daniell . T. J. Dyer . 1330 H. Bonham John Innes Jas. S. Biles .                                       | Lear of Balcarra 1417 Company's Ship B. Broughton . Rees Thomas J. P. Griffiths Exercise the Energy Company's Ship (Thes. W. Barrow Wm. Dulborn F. G. Morre | Marquis Camden 1261 W. C. Drysdale T. Larkins W. Haylett John Fenn H. J. Wolfe John Willie | 1333 John Campbell1348 Joseph Hare                                                                                      | Lord Lorather                    | Commy Star Company Stap Philip Baylar T. B. Pendold A. Broadhurst G. Credation J. G. F. Pigott F. Nerhan H. Beverage London 1332 Company's Stap Timothy Smith A. Rivers - I. W. K. Packman O. Richardson David Forest R. Didgeon London - I. See The Company's Stap Timothy Smith A. Rivers - I. W. K. Packman O. Richardson David Forest R. Didgeon London - I. See The Company Stap Timothy Smith A. Rivers - I. W. K. Packman O. Richardson David Forest R. Didgeon London - I. See The Company Stap David Forest R. Didgeon London - I. See The Company Stap David Forest R. Didgeon - I. See The Company Stap David Forest R. Didgeon - I. See The Company Stap David Forest R. Didgeon - I. See The Company Stap David Forest R. Didgeon - I. See The Company Stap David Forest R. Didgeon - I. See The Company Stap David Forest R. Didgeon - I. See The Company Stap David Forest R. Didgeon - I. See The Company Stap David Forest R. Didgeon - I. See The Company Stap David Forest R. Didgeon - I. See The Company Stap David Forest R. Didgeon - I. See The Company Stap David Forest R. Didgeon - I. See The Company Stap David Forest R. Didgeon - I. See The Company Stap David Forest R. Didgeon - I. See The Company Stap David Forest R. Didgeon - I. See The Company Stap David Forest R. Didgeon - I. See The Company Stap David Forest R. Didgeon - I. See The Company Stap David Forest R. Didgeon - I. See The Company Stap David Forest R. Didgeon - I. See The Company Stap David Forest R. Didgeon - I. See The Company Stap David Forest Research R. See The Company Stap David Forest Research Research Research R. See The Company Stap David Forest Research Research Research Research Research Research Resear | Orael 333 Matthew Isacke W. E. Farrer Jas. Wilson H. M. Isacke J. R. Pidding Charles Jones W. Erbinder W. M. Mingar Prince Regent S88 H. Botham Henry Hosmer R.H. Treheme Harry Harry G. M. Abbott F. Shaw R. Greig , Alex. Crowe. Data The Mirror When March 1. Alex. Crowe In M. William The March March March 1. Alex March In Mirror The March In Mirror The March In Mirror In March In Mirror . | 955 O. Wigram                                                                                                                                                      |   |
| Ships.                                                                        |                                                | General Harris 128                                                                                                          | Thomas Coutts 133                                                            | quis of Huntly 12, vickshire 113, ance                                                                                                                                                                                          | Aber crombie 133                                                                                                                | of Balcarras 141                                                                                                                                            | quis Camden 120                                                                            | Macqueen 13                                                                                                                 | l Lorother 13.le Huntly 131  | ning13.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                        | ice Regent 9X                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         | Marchioness of Ely 92                                                                                                                                              |   |

| PRICE CURRENT, Jan. 29.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       |
|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| PRICE CURRENT, Jan. 20. £. s. d. £. s. d.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     |
| EAST-INDIA PRODUCE.  £. s. d. £. s. d. £. s. d. Extra fine Violet  Extra fine Violet  Extra fine Violet                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       |
| £. s. d. £. s. d. Extra fine Violet  Coffee, Java                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                             |
|                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               |
| — Bourbon 3 0 0 — 5 0 0 — Copper                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                              |
|                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               |
|                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               |
| Drugs & for Dyeing. 15 0 0 - 21 0 0 Rice, Bengai William 0 18 0 - 1 1 0                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       |
| Drugs & for Dyeing.  Aloes, Epatica cwt. 15 0 0 - 21 0 0 Rice, Bergal Willer 0 18 0 - 1 1 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 - 1 10 0 -         |
| Borax, Reimed 1 3 0 - 1 10 0                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                  |
| Cambridge Malabar, b 0 13 0 - 0 16 0 Sik, Bright May 1 0 14 10 - 1 1 8                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                        |
| Carolinolis, Alada                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                            |
| Lignea th 0 0 6 - 0 1 3 Spices, Cinnamon 0 1 1 - 0 3 2                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                        |
| Castor Oil                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                    |
|                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               |
| — Assaterioa                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                  |
| Anini 30 0 - 29 0 Sugar, Bengal (wt. 1 10 - 1 17 0 - 13 0 0 - 30 0 - 30 0 - 30 0 - 30 0 - 5 ann and Chuia 1 10 0 - 1 17 0 - 117 0 0 0 0 0 0 0 0 0 0 0 0 0 0 0 0 0 0                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                           |
| 11 0 0 = 14 0 0 - 22 0 0 2 1 = 0 3 3                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                          |
| Kino 11 0 0 - 14 0 0 - 16 Congou 0 2 11 - 0 4 8 Lac Lake 15 0 1 0 - 0 1 6 Southong 0 2 11 - 0 4 8 Congou 0 2 10 - 0 4 8 Congou 0 2 10 - 0 4 8 Congou 0 2 6 - 0 3 3 Congou 0 2 6 - 0 2 6 - 0 3 Congou 0 2 6 - 0 2 6 - 0 2 6 - 0 2 6 - 0 2 6 - 0 2 6 - 0 2 6 - 0 2 6 - 0 2 6 - 0 2 6 - 0 2 6 - 0 2 6 - 0 2 6 - 0 2 6 - 0 2 6 - 0 2 6 - 0 2 6 - 0 2 6 - 0 2 6 - 0 2 6 - 0 2 6 - 0 2 6 - 0 2 6 - 0 2 6 - 0 2 6 - 0 2 6 - 0 2 6 - 0 2 6 - 0 2 6 - 0 2 6 - 0 2 6 - 0 2 6 - 0 2 6 - 0 2 6 - 0 2 6 - 0 2 6 - 0 2 6 - 0 2 6 - 0 2 6 - 0 2 6 - 0 2 6 - 0 2 6 - 0 2 6 - 0 2 6 - 0 2 6 - 0 2 6 - 0 2 6 - 0 2 6 - 0 2 6 - 0 2 6 - 0 2 6 - 0 2 6 - 0 2 6 - 0 2 6 - 0 2 6 - 0 2 6 - 0 2 6 - 0 2 6 - 0 2 6 - 0 2 6 - 0 2 6 - 0 2 6 - 0 2 6 - 0 2 6 - 0 2 6 - 0 2 6 - 0 2 6 - 0 2 6 - 0 2 6 - 0 2 6 -                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                        |
| Carrier 1 0 0 - 3 10 0 Carrier 1 0 2 3 - 0 3 0                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                |
|                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               |
| Oil, Cassia 0 9 0 - 0 10 0 - Hyson 0 3 4 - 0 3 8                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                              |
| — Cloves · · · · · · · · · · · · · · · · · · ·                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                |
| Nutnegs 0 2 9 = 0 3 0 Tortossessess Wood, Sanders Red ton 10 0 0                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                              |
| Opium                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         |
| Senna                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         |
| Turneric, 3333                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                |
|                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               |
|                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               |
| DAILY PRICES OF STOCKS, from 26 December 1827 to 25 January 1828.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                             |
| Dec. Bank 3 Pr. Ct. 3 Pr. Ct. 3 Pr. Ct. 3 Pr. Ct. N. 4 Pr. Ct. Long India India Bills. Stock. Red. Ann. Annuties. Stock. Bonds.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               |
|                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               |
| $\begin{vmatrix} 26 \\ 27 \end{vmatrix} = \begin{vmatrix} - \\ - \end{vmatrix}$                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                   |
| 28 53 549                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     |
| 1 29 2054 1854 1854 1854 1854 1854 1854 1854 18                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               |
| Jan.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                          |
| 1 82 84p 58 57p                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               |
| 2 2034 638638 — 901901901908 — 191 — 51 570                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                   |
| legiggt =   90% 90%90% =   190%   840   57   590                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                              |
| $5 - 83^{1}_{8}83^{3}_{8} 90^{1}_{90}90^{1}_{1}19^{1}_{1}19^{1}_{1} - 81^{1}_{1}19^{1}_{1} - 81^{1}_{1}19^{1}_{1}$                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                            |
| 2 205 garagi 891891 901 901 901 991 991 — 1                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                   |
| 8 200 cases 1 cases 1 cases 1 cases 1 cases 2 |
| $\begin{array}{c ccccccccccccccccccccccccccccccccccc$                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         |
|                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               |
| $\begin{array}{c ccccccccccccccccccccccccccccccccccc$                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         |
| 15 208 91 851 853 842 85 924 928 928 928 100 101 191 1958 2474 93p 60 62p                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     |
| $ \begin{array}{c ccccccccccccccccccccccccccccccccccc$                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                        |
|                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               |
| 19 09110 853855 858 - 92693 100 101 107 191 249 50 92 93 59 60                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                |
| $\begin{array}{c ccccccccccccccccccccccccccccccccccc$                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         |
|                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               |
| 1 - 1 1 2 5 - 1 0 2 0 0 10 0 10 10 10 1 10 1 10 10 10 10 10                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                   |
| $ \begin{array}{c ccccccccccccccccccccccccccccccccccc$                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                        |

THE # ASIATIC JOURNAL

FOR

MARCH, 1828.

Original Communications,

&c. &c. &c.

THE HINDU DRAMA.

In our twenty-third volume (p. 48), we announced that a translation of some select specimens of the theatre of the Hindus, executed by H. H. Wilson, Esq., whose acquirements as an oriental scholar are sufficiently known, had appeared at Calcutta. An analysis of the first piece in the collection, the Mruchehakati, accompanied by extracts, we were then enabled to give from sundry critical notices of the work contained in the various journals of Cal-

It is but recently that copies of the work* have reached England, and we hasten to lay before the readers of the Asiatic Journal an analytical notice of this curious publication, which opens a new avenue to our rescarches into the history, the manners, and the character of the ancient Hindus.

Until the appearance of Sir Wm. Jones's translation of the dramatic poem of Sakuntalá, the western world hardly knew that the Hindus had a national drama. Notwithstanding the notice which that elegant version of an elegant poem obtained in Europe, the only contributions that have been since added to our knowledge of the Hindu drama, are the Prabodha Chandrodaya, translated by Dr. Taylor, and an epitome of the Málati Mádhava, given by Mr. Colebrooke in his essay on Sanserit and Prákrit prosody, published in thas furnished the names of many dramatic poems (including some of those now translated by Mr. Wilson), but has given the reader little or no information respecting them beyond their names.

It is not, therefore, to be wondered at, that European writers should labour under erroneous impressions with regard to this department of Hindu literature. Neither Sakuntalá nor the Prabodha Chandrodaya, as Mr. Wilson remarks, can be considered to convey an accurate notion of the Hindu theatre. "Each Select Specimens of the Theatre of the Hindus, translated from the original Sanscrit. By Horace Hayman Wilson, Esq. Calcutta, 1827.

 3 vols. 8vo.

"Each is but the species of its own genus: the latter belongs to the metaphysical, the former to the mytho-pastoral class of Sanscrit plays; but these two varieties are far from representing every class and order; their wide dissimilarity might lead us to anticipate the extensive range of the theatre to which they belong, and to infer that, where such striking distinctions were to be found, others less decidedly marked must prevail. The inference would be justified by the fact; and the Hindu theatre affords examples of the drama of domestic as well as of heroic life, of original invention as well as of legendary tradition."

Mr. Mill, who, in his cagerness to expose the exaggerated representations of writers partial to the Hindus, often falls into an opposite error, necessarily deduced his conclusions respecting the dramatic compositions of that people from Sakuntalá, which he admits contains some beautiful passages, but beyond these, he says, "there is nothing in the poem which either accords with the understanding, or can gratify the fancy, of an instructed people;" and he seems to think that the Hindu drama is upon a par with that of the Chinese, "who excel in poetry as well as the Hindus; yet our British ambassador and his retinue found their dramatic entertainments very rude and dull entertainments."

Whatever may be the merits or defects of the Hindu drama, remarks Mr. Wilson, (from whose admirable preface we shall be indebted for most of the observations which follow,) they are unmixedly its own: it is impossible that they should have borrowed their dramatic compositions from people either of ancient or modern times. The Hindu theatre belongs to that branch of dramatic composition which modern critics have agreed to term romantic, in opposition to what some schools have been pleased to term classical: an opinion already suggested by Von Schlegel.

Hindu dramatic writers show no veneration for the unities of time, place, and action, though they are not destitute of systematic and sensible rules; and "they are as unfamiliar with the extravagance of the Chinese dramas, as with the severe simplicity of Grecian tragedy." The following fact is important:

There is one peculiarity in the Hindu theatre, which remarkably distinguishes it from that of every other people. Although there is little reason to doubt that the Sanscrit language was once a spoken tongue in some parts of India, yet it does not seem probable that it was ever the vernacular language of the whole country, and it certainly ceased to be a living dialect at a period of which we have no knowledge.

The greater part of every play is written in Sanscrit. None of the dramatic compositions at present known can boast perhaps of a very high antiquity, and several of them are comparatively modern. They must therefore have been unintelligible to a considerable portion of their audiences, and never could have been so directly addressed to the bulk of the population, as to have exercised much influence upon their passions or their tastes.

The length of the plays is a great drawback to their interest: but as they were written with a view to but one specific representation, this fact accounts not only for the length of the plays, but for their rarity. Though they do not, like those of China, occupy ten days in the representation, they sometimes extend to ten acts, and must have been five or six hours in performing.

Mr. Wilson is of opinion that the number of Hindu plays extant is not much more than sixty: the names of that number of pieces are inserted by him in another place. Many have perished, and some have become scarce. Inferior productions of the drama seem, indeed, to have been more numerous, in the vernacular dialects: "the dramatic pieces which have survived are those of the highest order, defended by their intriasic purity from the corrosion of time." The essays of modern times in India appear to have been of an inferior character: "the Hindus have a strong relish for these diversions, but the domination under which they so long pined, and which was ever so singularly hostile to public enjoyments of a refined character, rendered theatrical representations infrequent, and induced a neglect of dramatic literature. Plays, however, continued to be written and performed, to the latest periods, especially in the west and south of India, where Hindu principalities still subsisted. Performances also seem to have been exhibited at Benares in recent times, and we have one piece, which was written, and possibly represented, in Bengal, but a very few years ago."

Sir Wm. Jones, in his preface to Sakuntalá, expresses his opinion that the Hindu drama must have been carried to great perfection under the reign of Vicramaditya, a century before Christ: whatever credit be due to this statement, it is certain that the nations of Europe possessed no dramatic literature before the fourteenth or fifteenth century, at which period the Hindu drama had passed into its decline. Those of the ancient nations around India, with the exception of the Chinese (whose dramas Lord Macartney termed "wretched," though they deserve a better character), had a stage naturalized amongst them; so that we may fairly deduce from hence an evidence in favour of the early date of Hindu society, even if we are debarred (as Mr. Mill tells us) from considering dramatic entertainments as indicative of growth in knowledge and civilization.

The dramatic system of the Hindus is the subject of a separate dissertation prefixed by Mr. Wilson to the first play. Of this curious article we shall endeavour to lay before our readers a brief epitome.

The invention of dramatic composition is traced by the Hindus to a divine source: it is usually attributed to a Muni or inspired sage, named Bharata, one of the earliest writers by whom the art was reduced to a system: his sutras, or aphorisms, are constantly cited by commentators, though his entire work is not in existence. One of the earliest and best treatises extant on dramatic literature, according to Mr. Wilson, is the Dasa Rúpaka, or description of the ten kinds of theatrical composition, the text of which, by Dhananjaya, is ascertained to be of the eleventh century, though references are made in the gloss to the Retnávalí, a play of the twelfth century. Other critical works upon the drama are the Saraswati Kant'hábharana, of uncertain date; the Kávya Prakása, by Mammatta Bhatta, a Cashmirian, which is about five centuries old; the Sáhitya Derpana, also of uncertain date, subsequent to the preceding, but anterior to A.D. 1504; and the Sangita Retnákara, written by Sárngi Deva, a Cashmirian pundit, who flourished about the fifteenth century. There are various other works which treat of poetry in all its branches; and the commentaries which accompany some of the plays add much information respecting the history and system of the Hindu drama. From these several sources Mr. Wilson has derived materials for a very interesting disquisition upon this subject.

With their characteristic fondness for definition and nice critical arrangement, Hindu writers have classified all the parts of this department of their literature with scrupulous care and exactitude. The general term for all dramatic compositions is Rúpaka, from rúpa, "form;" its object being to embody characters and feelings. Dramatic writings are arranged in two classes; the Rúpakas, properly so called, and the Uparúpakas, or minor rúpakas: there are ten species of the former, and eighteen of the latter.

As a specimen of the refinement of the rules for the Hindu drama, we subjoin Mr. Wilson's description of the nature of the Nataka, or "play," xar' ἐρχὴν, the first species of the Rúpaka, which, as it comprises all the elements of a dramatic composition, is fully explained in the systems of the Hindu critics, before any notice is taken of the inferior varieties.

Specimens of the Nátaka are not wanting to illustrate its technical description, and we can therefore follow the original authorities with entire confidence. It is declared to be the most perfect kind of dramatic composition. The subject should always be celebrated and important. According to the Sáhitya Derpana, the story should be selected from mythological or historical record alone, but the Dasa Rúpaka asserts, that it may be also fictitious or mixed, or partly resting on tradition and partly the creation of the author. The practice of the early writers seems to have sanctioned the latter rule, and although they adopted their plots from sacred poems or puránas, they considered themselves at liberty to vary the incidents as they pleased. Modern bards have been more scrupulous. The restriction imposed upon the selection of the subject, is the same as that to which the French theatre so long submitted, from whose tragic code all newly invented topics were excluded, in supposed imitation of the Greek theatre, in which however the Flower of Agathon, founded altogether upon fiction, was an early and popular production,

Like the Greek tragedy, however, the Nataka is to represent worthy or exalted personages only, and the hero must be a monarch, as Dushyanta, a demigod as Rama, or a divinity as Krishna. The action, or more properly the passion, should be but one, as love, or heroism. The plot should be simple, the incidents consistent, the business should spring direct from the story as a plant from its seed, and should be free from episodical and prolix interruptions. The time should not be protracted, and the duration of an act, according to the elder authority, should not exceed one day, but the Shhitya Derpana extends it to a few days, or even to one year. When the action cannot be comprised within these limits, the less important events may be thrown into narrative, or may be supposed to pass between the acts, or they may be communicated to the audience by one of the actors, who holds the character of an interpreter, and explains to the persons of the assembly whatever they may require to know, or what is not conveyed to them by the representation; a rather awkward contrivance to supply the deficiencies of the piece, but one that would sometimes be useful to insinuate the plot into the audiences of more polished communities. The diction of a Nataka should be perspicuous and polished. The piece should consist of not fewer than five acts, and not more than ten.

Mr. Wilson points out several indications of analogy between the Nataka and the Greek tragedy. The unity of action is recognized, and a simplicity of business enjoined fully in the spirit of the Grecian drama. The unity of place is unnoticed; that of time is curiously modified: " the time required for the fable elapses invariably between the acts." An important distinction between the Hindu and Greek drama is the total absence of distinction between tragedy and comedy in the former: the Hindus, in fact, have no tragedy, the tragic catastrophe being prohibited by positive rule: thereby furnishing a contradiction to the received theory, that tragedy preceded comedy. Modern Hindu dramatists have sometimes violated the precepts which enjoin a due regard to decorum on the stage, not only by the non-infliction of death, but by excluding hostile defiance, solemn imprecation, and other similar incidents: but "the classical drama of the Hindus is exemplary and dignified." The Sakuntalá furnishes one specimen of the Nátaka species; and one of the plays in Mr. Wilson's collection, the Mudrá Rákshasa, or "the Signet of the Minister," affords another.

The Prakarana is a second species of the Rúpaka; the fable is a pure fiction drawn from real life, in a respectable class of society, and the most appro-appropriate subject is love. The Bhana is a monologue in one act, in which the performer narrates dramatically a variety of occurrences as happening either to himself or others: the narrator may enliven his recitation by a pretended dialogue with an imaginary interlocutor. "It is not impossible," adds Mr. Wilson, "that ventriloquism assisted to give effect to the imaginary dialogue, as the art is not unknown in India." The English reader cannot fail to be struck with the obvious similarity between this mode of dramatic entertainment and that employed by a popular English actor. The Vvávoga is a dramatic representation, in one act, of some military transaction, in which the sentiment of love is excluded, as well as comic incidents. The Samayakára is the exhibition of some mythological fable, in three acts. Although love may be touched upon in this species, heroism should be the predominant passion. The actors are chiefly gods and demons: tempests, combats, the storming of towns, with all the pomp of war, may be introduced. The Samudra Mathanam, " churning of the ocean," (a splendid subject for such a spectacle) was an example of this species, but the piece no longer exists. The Dhima is a drama similar to the last, but of a more gloomy character, and is limited to the representation of terrific events. The Ihamiga, the Anka, the Vit'hí, and the Praharsana, are the remaining species; the latter is a comic, or rather farcical satire.

The second class of dramas, the Uparúpakas, do not so readily admit of clucidation and description, since the pieces cited as examples are not known to exist, except in the two first instances. "All these varieties," observes Mr. Wilson, "are clearly reducible to but two, differing according to the loftier or lowlier tone of the composition, the more serious or comic tenour of the subject, and the regularity or irregularity of the construction. We might also conveniently transfer to them the definitions of the European stage, and class them under the heads of tragedy, comedy, opera, ballet, burletta, melodrama, and farce. Their technical distribution is however very unimportant, and the enumeration of the distinctions as originally recognized is a matter of little interest, except as it conveys a satisfactory proof of the extent to which dramatic literature was once cultivated by the Hindus."

The dramatic arrangement of the pieces discloses some curious features. "Every piece opens with a prelude or induction, in which the audience are made acquainted with the author, his works, the actors, and such part of the prior events as it is necessary for the spectators to know." It is in dialogue; the actors in the prelude are never more than two, the manager and one of his company. It opens with a prayer invoking in a benedictory formula the protection of some deity in favour of the audience, spoken, it is supposed, by the manager. This person, termed Sutradhára, is required to be "well versed in light literature, as narrative, plays, and poetry—he should be familiar with various dialects—acquainted with the customs of different classes, and the manners of various people, experienced in dramatic details, and conversant with different mechanical arts."

The prayer is followed by an encomiastic account of the author of the piece; after which succeeds a complimentary appeal to the favour of the audience, wherein the manager sometimes gives a dramatic representation of himself and his concerns, &c. In Sakuntalá, an actress sings a song descriptive of the hot season, for the amusement of the audience.

The piece is opened, sometimes abruptly, by the entrance of one of the scenic personages, and the business is carried on in the same manner as in European theatres, divided into scenes and acts. Two persons, the interpreter preter and the introducer, upon any interruption in the regular course of the piece, by change of place, or by the entrance of a character unannounced by the dialogue, supply the audience with the necessary explanation. What these characters are to do or say is left to the persons who fill them. Sometimes the parts of these supplementary characters are interwoven with the texture of the fable.

The anka, or act, is said to be closed when all the personages have left the stage. "The precise division of Hindu plays into acts is a feature which serves to discriminate them from the Greek compositions, in which the division into acts was unknown. It appears to have been an arrangement invented by the Romans, from whom we can scarcely suspect the Hindus to have derived it."

The first act furnishes a clue to the subject of the whole story; the ensuing acts carry on the business to the final development; and in general, says Mr. Wilson, the Hindu writers are successful in maintaining the character of their exode, the business being rarely completed before the concluding act. The piece closes with a benediction or prayer by the principal personage, who expresses his wishes for general plenty and happiness.

The conduct of the plot forms the subject of nicer and more exact rules than the French critics ever conceived for the epopee. The business of every piece is termed its substance, or thing, which is of two kinds, principal and secondary, or essential and episodical. Every business involves five elements, each of which comprehends a number of angas, or members, "to follow the description of which," Mr. Wilson remarks, "would be to exhaust any patience except Hindu." He justly adds, however, that considerable artifice must have been employed by the Hindu dramatists, in the construction of their fable, to authorize such a complicated subdivision of its details.

The characters of the drama comprehend every class of society, though each kind of pieces has its appropriate hero and heroine. As love enters largely into the business of the Hindu theatre, the attributes of the hero are defined with reference to his fitness for feeling and inspiring that passion; he must be young, handsome, graceful, liberal, valiant, amiable, accomplished, and well-born. Here, however, the refinements of Hindu system have introduced endless classifications. The chief qualities of the hero are four: these are subdivided into forty-eight, which number, by modifications, is multiplied to one hundred and forty-four kinds. "It must be rather difficult," remarks Mr. Wilson, " for a writer to observe, amidst such a multiplicity, the rule laid down for his delineation of the manner of his hero; for whatever individual he adopts, he must take care to make him consistent with himself, and not to give him qualities incompatible with his organization." The classificacation of the heroines is equally minute; and the extent to which females are partakers of scenic incident affords an interesting picture of the relations of that sex in Hindu society.

It seems probable that the princes of India learnt the practice of the rigid exclusion of women in their harems from the Mohammedans, and that previously, although they were subject to many restrictions, they were allowed to go freely into public on public occasions; they were present at dramatic performances, they formed the chief part of bridal processions, they were permitted to visit the temples of the gods, and to perform their ablutions with little or no privacy in sacred streams, which last-named privileges they still retain, and to which Mohammedan women have no similar right. Even in later times, the presence of men, other than a husband or a son, was far from prohibited in the inner apartments, and the minister of Vatsa, with his chamberlain, and the envoy from Ceylon, are admitted to the audience of the raja, in the presence of the queen, and her attending damsels. In what may be considered heroic times, queens and princesses seem to have travelled about where end how they pleased, and in the Uttara Ráma Cheritra, Sita is sent to live by herself in the forests, and the mother of Ráma comes with little or no parade to the hermitage of Válmiki.

Although, however, the social restraints to which females were subjected under the ancient Hindu system, were of a very different nature from those which Mohammedanism imposes, and were in all probability even less severe than those which prevailed in many of the Grecian states, they did no doubt operate to such an extent as to preclude women from taking any part in general society. This was more particularly the case with unmarried women, and we learn from several of the dramas, that it was a part of virtuous breeding for a virgin to decline conversation with a man, even with a lover—thus Ságariká in the Retnávalí, and Málati in Málati and Mádhava, can with difficulty be prevailed upon to address the objects of their affection! they answer to every question by proxy, and do not even trust their voices to their female companion above a whisper, when those they adore are present. Unmarried women, therefore, we may infer, might be in company with men, and might hear their addresses, but would have violated decorum if they had ventured to reply. No restraint of this nature was imposed upon married women.

Besides the hero and heroine, the dramatis personæ consisted of the friend and confidant of the hero (or sometimes the hero of a secondary action), the counterpart and antagonist of the hero, and the Vitá and Vidúshaka, characters in some degree peculiar to the Hindu stage. That of the Vitá is not very easily understood. "It is necessary that he should be accomplished in the lighter arts, particularly poetry, music, and singing, and he appears indiscriminately as the companion of a man or woman, although in the latter case the female is the courtesan: he is generally represented on familiar and easy, and yet dependent terms with his associate, and evinces something of the character of the parasite of the Greek comedy, but that he is never rendered contemptible. It does not appear that he professes to teach the arts he practices, although it was not impossible that such was his employment, and that he was retained about the person of the wealthy and dissipated, as a kind of private instructor as well as entertaining companion." The Vidúshaka is the buffoon of the Hindu theatre; he is the humble companion, not the servant, of a man of rank, and it is remarkable that he is always a Brahman. According to the technical definition of his attributes, "he is to excite mirth by being ridiculous in person, age, and attire,"

The heroine has her companion and confidente; and female devotees play a leading part in several dramas; they are usually described as of the Bauddha sect.

The subordinate characters include every class of society, even Chândálas. The male characters enumerated as tenants of the interior of palaces are eunuchs, mutes, dwarfs, foresters, and barbarians; and the attendance of females on the persons of kings is another peculiarity, especially as it appears, from the Mudrá Rákshasa, that this practice was not confined to the inner apartments; for the celebrated Chandragupta, who appears as a dramatic personage in that piece, is so attended from one palace to another.

The objects of dramatic representation constitute the subject of another branch of Mr. Wilson's disquisition. This is, however, treated in a manner so metaphysical, that it would be impossible to epitomize, and inconvenient to quote it at length. We pass therefore to the subject of diction.

This part of the disquisition reveals some curious facts. A striking peculiarity of Hindu plays is, that different characters use different forms of speech; not like the patois in French comedies, or dialects in the English, which are individual individual and occasional: but general and invariable. The hero and principal personages speak Sanscrit; the women and inferior characters use the various modifications of that term denominated Prákrit. Of the different dialects comprehended under this term, the heroine and principal female characters speak Sauraséni; attendants on royal personages, Magadhi; servants, Rajputs and traders, Arddha, half or mixed Magadhi. The Vidúshaka speaks the Práchi, or eastern dialect. Rogues use Avantiká, or the language of Oujein; and intriguers, that of the Dekkin or Peninsula. "The dialect of Bahlika is spoken by the people of the north, and Dravira by the people of the Coromandel coast. The individuals named Sakas and Sakaris, speak dialects of their own, and cowherds, outcasts, and foresters use their respective forms of speech. Even the imps of mischief have their appropriate jargon, and the Pisáchas or goblins, when introduced on the stage, speak a dialect of Prákrit termed Paisáchi." Such, it appears, are the rules: in practice, however, there are rarely more than three varieties, or Sanscrit, and a Prákrit more or less refined. "If these distinctions were implicitly followed," observes Mr. Wilson, "a Hindu play would be a polyglot, which few individuals could hone to understand."

The style of dramatic composition, conformably to Bharata, should be elevated, polished, and highly embellished; and accordingly, in no department of Hindu literature are the powers of the Sanscrit language more lavishly developed. Some of the modern pieces are painful to read; in the oldest and best, though the style is highly finished, it is not difficult of apprehension. The ordinary business-dialogue is for the greater part in prose; but reflections, the descriptions, and the poetical flights of the author, are in verse. "It is impossible," says Mr. Wilson, "to conceive language so beautifully musical or so magnificently grand, as that of many of the verses of Bhavabhútí and Kálidása."

We must rapidly glance at the last branch of the disquisition, on Scenic Apparatus. The Hindus had no edifices devoted to this species of entertainment; their scenery was therefore imperfect. The drama was not a popular amusement, as with us, but formed part of an occasional celebration of a religious festival. The Sangita Retnákara contains an allusion to a place where dancing and singing were performed; it describes it as a chamber, covered by an awning, supported by pillars hung with garlands; the master of the house took his scat on a throne in the centre, persons of rank were seated on his right, the inmates on his left; the different officers of the household, female attendants, guards, &c. are assigned their posts, and persons carrying wands are to be stationed to keep order. The performers were separated from the audience by a curtain or skreen. The properties of the Hindu stage were limited; but seats, thrones, weapons, and cars, with live cattle, were used. Costume was always observed, and various proofs occur of the personages being dressed in character. Females were represented in general by females, but it appears not to have been uncommon for men or lads to personate women. The "exit" and "entrance" of a performer are duly marked, as well as the instructions for stage business, the "asides" and "aparts" being as regularly indicated as in modern European plays. Even the sentiment with which the speaker is to express his part is sometimes particularized.

In our next number we shall give a copious analysis of some of the pieces in this collection.

TITLES AND OFFICES IN CHINA.

(Concluded from p. 172).

TSEANG-KEUN, "conductor of an army," is a military title which took its rise during the civil wars at the close of the Chow, and has continued ever since. During the three first Chinese dynasties, the imperial standing army was 75,000 men, commanded by six general officers, called King. In later times high-sounding epithets have been added to the title of Tseang-keun, e. g. Szeching-tseang-keun, "generals to subjugate the four quarters of the heavens." The military titles or designations of rank are too long to be enumerated here. The highest rank was Kuen-shwae, a sort of field marshal: the Ming dynasty had at first a board of these high officers; but the title was afterwards changed, and the office of Yuen-shwae has been discontinued.

The transmission of orders from the general to the soldier was managed as follows: the Tsung-ping ("general soldier") gave his orders to an officer called Too-che-hwuy, who passed them to a Che-hwuy, who gave them to a captain of a thousand, and he to a captain of a hundred, who announced them to the general standard-bearer, who repeated them to the bearers of small banners, by whom they were communicated to the Keun-sze, or men in the ranks.

Tsung-thh (vulgarly pronounced by Europeans Jong-tuck), "general governor," erroneously translated "viceroy," is a title of office now held by governors of provinces. The emperor Kea-tsing (A.D. 1549), when the Tartars pressed upon the capital, made this appointment, though the title had been used by Yung-lö in 1410. The latter also originated the Shun-foo ("to travel about and soothe"), a title now given to deputy governors of provinces. This officer is also called Foo-tae and Foo-yuen.

Seuen-foo-sze was the title of an officer sent to soothe the people when suffering under any calamity, and to remedy abuses. It is said that one of these officers, sent round the empire by Ta-th (A.D. 1300), dismissed 18,473 government officers for bribery and corruption, and liberated 5,176 persons from unjust imprisonment. The Ming made this office local and hereditary in the persons of country gentlemen of the literary class.

The class of officers distinguished by foo-sze appended to their titles were (many of them at least) filled by particular families in succession: the reigning Tartar family has made several offices hereditary as a reward for eminent services rendered to the state.

Seuen-yu-sze, though classed amongst military officers, was an appointment the duties of which consisted solely in "preaching authoritatively virtuous sentiments," without any connexion with the army. This class of officers has been in abeyance since the Kin dynasty.

Tc-kcu ("to lift or raise up") is the title of an officer appointed to keep the price of grain at a medium rate; the office was devised by Le-kwei to equalize the value of this commodity; and in the reign of Shun-hwa (A.D. 967) a public granary was established, which has continued ever since under its original appellation, Ching-ping-tsang, "the ever-open granary." The Te-keu 'ad also authority to prevent forestalling of commodities. Latterly the pithet Te-keu has indicated certain revenue functions in the officers to whose tiles it attaches.

Too-ta-te-keu-cha-ma, "general superintendent of tea and horses," is an ppointment which originated with the emperor He-ning (A.D. 1060) owing to 16 following circumstances: A barter trade, in which horses were exchanged distalle Journ. Vol. 25. No. 147.

for tea, which commenced in the Tang dynasty, was carried on between the Hwuy-hih Tartars and the Chinese, on the north-west frontier: at first there were Cha-sze, "directors of the tea department," and Ma-sze, "directors of the horse department;" but it was found that "the tea directors, not having connected with their duties the purchase of horses, adopted measures to destroy the horses,"* and consequently the horses and the tea were placed under one and the same direction. In the reign of Hung-che (A.D. 1490) of the Ming, the barter of tea for horses was a government monopoly, both at Sze-chuen province and at Shen-sc. The persons authorized to buy had a gold medal to authenticate their commission. For superior horses they gave a pecul of tea (133 lbs.); for middling horses, 70 catties; for inferior, 50 catties, or half a pecul.

Ching seuen-poo-ching-sze, commonly called the Poo-ching-sze, is a receiver and promulger of the decisions of the supreme government in each province. He is also treasurer of the province, and has the appointment of the inferior local officers. He is required every ten years to prepare from the door boards and to keep on record a list of the population. This officer, the criminal judge, and the superintendent of the salt department, form a board called San-sze, or "the three directors;" this board is frequently convened by the governor-general to deliberate on local occurrences.

Kwan-chă-sze, "observing and examining commissioners," were first appointed by Ching-kwan (A.D. 650), who sent thirteen persons to make a tour throughout the empire and examine its condition. The Kin connected this appointment with the Tsëë-too-sze; and the Yuen transferred the duties of this office to the Seuen-foo, "soothers of the people," before-mentioned. The Ming annexed the duties to those of the Gan-cha-sze, or resident criminal judge of the province.

The Te-hing-gan-cha-sze were circuit judges first appointed by the emperor Tae-tsung (A.D. 990); military officers were employed for a short time in this judicial capacity, but upon the misconduct of one so employed, the office reverted to civilians. The Yuen dynasty named four roads, i. e. circuits, to which these judges were appointed; and the office of the Keuen-nung-sze, or encourager of agriculture, was annexed to theirs. By the Ming, the judges were affixed to provinces, and the office remains so at the present day.

Chuen-yun-sze was an officer appointed under the Tang to superintend the transport of commodities by land and water throughout the empire. There was also a Tsaou-yun-sze under the Yuen, to attend to the transport of grain from the provinces to the capital.

Yen-tëë-sze was an officer appointed under the Han to superintend the making of salt and smelting of iron. "One statesman," says the Chinese anthor, "said that salt and iron were the great treasures of the country." At the present time, the collection of the duties on salt belongs to the same officer who collects the duties on iron.

Tsze-she is the title of an office first adopted by Wan-te (B.C. 160), in consequence of the Yu-she officers being disobedient to the laws; the emperor "sent forth a minister of state, in the capacity of Tsze-she, with powers to regulate the officers called Köen-chā-yu-she." In the time of Këen-woo (A.D. 60) the empire was divided into twelve deparaments called Chow (a word which has designated at different times a very different extent of territory); and over each of these Chow a Tsze-she was appointed. Respecting these officers, there there was a remarkable deviation from common usage: "even at the death of a father or mother, they could not leave their office." During the reign of Ling-te (A.D. 190) the title of Tsze-she, given to these governors of departments, was changed to Chow-muh, or "the Chow's shepherd."

* This passage is a close translation of the original Chinese; its exact sense is not at all clear.

The Chow departments were of three classes: superior, middle, and inferior: "from the highest of the superior to the lowest of the inferior, there were nine distinctions." In the reign of Kae-hwang (A.D. 584) a different division of the empire took place, and the name Tsze-she, though retained, did not denote the same high office. The geographical terms Keun and Chow interchanged places-several times. The Yuen dynasty made the Chow inferior to the Keun; the Ming made the Chow inferior to the Foo districts, which arrangement the Ta-tsing, or reigning dynasty, has continued.

The Yuen divided China into provinces called loo, "roads;" a department of the empire containing more than 100,000 families they called a Shang-loo, "higher road;" if it were an important part of the country it was so designated, although its population might not be so great. An ordinary territory, with a population less than 100,000 families, was called a Hea-loo, "inferior road." Over each of the Loo, Chow, and Heen districts under the Yuen dynasty, was appointed a superior officer, called, in their Tartar language, Tăloo-hwa-chih, who had charge of the seal of office. The reigning Tartar family is accustomed to confer honorary titles (like the aforegoing) taken from the Manchow language untranslated. The Ming dynasty put an end to the Loo divisions, and at both the capitals erceted Chih-le, or self-governed Foo, i. e. districts independent of larger divisions of the country; and they distributed the rest of the empire into Săng, Foo, Chow, and Hëen, or provinces containing districts called Foo, Chow, and Heen, which is the actual geographical division of China. The governor of a Sang is called Tsung-tuh, or governor general: the governors of the other three divisions are designated by the word che, "to know," prefixed to the name of the district: thus a Che-foo is the governor of a Foo, one whose duty it is to know and manage its affairs.

King-yin, "the ruler of the metropolis," is the governor of the capital; his title has varied in different periods of Chinese history. Under the Han he was called King-chaou-yin, "ruler of the million;" under the Yuen, Too-tsung-kwan, "governor general of the metropolis." The two last dynasties have denominated this officer Foo-yin. The words kin and yin are both used occasionally to denote the imperial residence, or the district in which the court is held.

Tae-show, "great keeper," was the governor of a province or district. "When Tsin conquered the whole of China he exterminated the Choo-how princes of former times, and converted their territories into states called keun, over which he placed a Show, a Ching, and a Wei (officers so called); "the Show ruled the people, the Chin assisted the Show, and the Wei commanded the military." King-te (B.C. 130) changed the title Keun-show to Tae-show, which was subsequently altered to Ta-yin. Under the Tsin, the Keun-show governors had the term general (tseang-keun) added to their titles: "those who had not this military appellation considered the want of it a disgrace." Woo-tih, the founder of the Tang (A.D. 923), changed the Keun into Chow, and altered Tae-show to Tsze-she, with the superaddition of "holder of the seal." He afterwards made a urther addition to their titles, calling these governors "envoys, holders of the seals of all the armies;" although they had really no seal, but merely a Tung-yu-foo, "copper-fish credential."

Heen-ling denotes the magistrate of a Heen district, which, in ancient times, under the Chow (B.C. 1100 to 240) extended 400 le; the magistrate was then called called Heen-ching. During the civil-wars at the close of that dynasty, many of the separate states became Heen districts, and the chief of the Heen city was denominated variously Tsae, Yin, Ling, and Ta-foo. The Yuen (A.D. 1281) first made a district of 6,000 families a Heen of the first degree; but subsequently, in the southern provinces, a first Heen required 30,000 families. The Ming (A.D. 1365) determined the relative rank of the Heen districts, not by the population, but by the quota of revenue, expressed in measures of grain: 100,000 shih* to 60,000 constituted the district of a Heen of the first rank.

Heang-kwan were village officers, in ancient times called Heang-sze, "master of the village;" Heang-laou, "old man of the village;" Heang-ta-foo, "great man of the village," &c. The village then was estimated to consist of 12,500 houses or families (the term village, however, does not correctly convey the sense of heang; it is a subdivision of a district). Beneath the chief officer were the following: the Chow-chang, who was the head-man of 2,500 houses; the Tang-ching, who was placed over 500 houses; the Tsun-sze, over 100 houses; the Leu-seu, over 25; the Pe-sze was placed over 20 lanes; the Tswan-chang, over 4 le, or lanes of another kind; the Le-tsae was over 5 lin, which constituted one le; and the Lin-chang was over 5 houses, which constituted a lin.

Tsin, the overthrower of the Chow dynasty (B.C.240) changed these arrangements: he made 10 le a Ting, or pavilion,† ruled by a Ting-chang; 10 pavilions were considered a Heang, over which was placed a San-laou, "thrice old man," to teach the people; a Sih-foo, "gatherer of the harvest," to adjust rural differences; and a Yew-keaou, or "patrol," to guard against thieves. There was also an officer added by the Han (who continued the aforegoing system), whose duty it was to encourage domestic virtues and husbandry. At this period, it is said, commenced the custom of granting honorary tablets to place over the doors of virtuous individuals.

Succeeding dynasties changed this system, making a Heang consist of 10,000 houses, governed by officers appointed over 1,000, 100, 10, and 5 houses, respectively, with corresponding titles. At present, a village is said to consist of 5 Chow, or 25 Tang, or 75 Tsüh (clans), or 375 Le (lanes), or 1,875 Lin (neighbourhoods), or 9,375 houses; the number 5, it will be seen, is the ratio of progression in these sums.

The Chinese work from whence the aforegoing particulars are taken then gives an account of the "letters-patent nobility" of China. Of this we shall also give an abridgment.

Under the ancient dynasty of Yin, the tseŏ, or nobles, were of three degrees, in imitation of the three glorious lights of nature, the sun, moon, and stars. Under the Chow they were of five degrees, in allusion to the five elements of nature, namely, water, fire, wood, metal, and earth.

The nobles of ancient times were inferior kings or princes, ruling over a certain territory: the emperor (Tëen-tsze, or "son of heaven") had a domain of 1,000 le in extent; the Kung and How nobles had 100 le; the Pin 70; the Tsze and the Nan 50, or about 12 square miles English. Those nobles who were unable to command 50 le were not united to, or immediately dependent on, the emperor, but were attached to bles of larger territories than their their own. The Chinese "world" was then divided into nine Chow provinces, which contained 1,770 kwo, or nations.

* A measure equal to about 140 lbs. English.

† Ting signifies a slied or portico in public ways for the people to rest under, a dome supported by pillars in a garden. Perhaps in old times it denoted a tent, and the people were, at this early period, nomade.

Another statement of the distribution of territory amongst the ancient nobles is as follows: beyond the limits of the imperial domain of 1,000 le was a Fang-pih, with five kwo, or associated states, each having a superior called Chang; ten nations made a Leen, over which was a Shwae; thirty made a Tsüh, over which was a Ching; 210 constituted a Chow, over which was a superior noble, called Pih; these Pih were eight in number, all of whom were dependent on two ministers of the emperor, called Urh-Pih, or the two Pih, who "divided the empire into left and right."

The posterity of the Choo-how nobles, or those of 100 le, ruled over their estates by hereditary right; but the Ta-foo, or superior magistates of provinces or districts, did not transmit their rank to their descendants.

This view of the origin of the Chinese nobility is very plausible and probable: it hence appears that titles were at first annexed to territorial possessions, as in our own country. The holders of offices retained their titles, derived from those offices, only so long as they held them, or at most during life. The subsequent revolutions in the empire overturned the authority of the territorial nobles, and deprived them, consequently, of the titles which their possessions conferred. In our own country, the titles of Earl and Baron have survived the loss of the territory to which they were originally attached.

Tsin, who conquered the petty independent states of China about B.C. 240, and under whom China first became, properly speaking, an empire (though it comprehended less than half the northern part of modern China), instituted, it is said, twenty degrees of nobility, to reward the meritorious services of his officers. He created twenty nobles called Chè-how, and nineteen at court who were denominated Kwan-nuy-how. 'The latter had no nations or cities "to supply them with food or give them revenue;" their titles were fung, or by letters-patent. These titles, contemptuously termed empty; were afterwards multiplied, and in fact established, by Wei.

When the Han, a celebrated dynasty in Chinese history (and to which science and learning in particular are said to be under vast obligations), succeeded Tsin, it created two degrees of nobility, Wang and How; the former title, which is translated king, included the emperor's sons, who are said, indeed, to be the Choo-how of antiquity before-mentioned. The Wang, on creation, "received a reed and some earth, with which they repaired to their destined territory to creet altars to the land."* The How comprehended those statesmen, not of the imperial family, who were ennobled on account of their merit: these were called Chě-how. All these nobles, however, had territories allotted to them; the higher classes had 10,000 houses and upwards; the inferior 500 or 600. "Land," says the original work, "was shared out to the nobles, but not to the people. It was in the time of Han that the people began to be shared out to the nobles, and all the Kings had each of them several tens of cities."

The Han dynasty, besides the titles of nobility, added appellations of excellence, and conferred the privilege of special admission to the imperial presence, and a seat amongst the ministers. Inferior statesmen, ennobled by patent, were called Chaou-how or court nobles; these wore crowns, with a flat parallelogram-shaped board laid upon the head, and embroidered garments, When related to the imperial family they were called Wei-choo-how.

* This practice reminds us of the livery and seizm of the old English law.

The Wei sovereignty had six titles of nobility; Wang, Kung, How, Pih, Tsze, and Nan. Titles were also invented for the sons of the different classes. Other distinctions, and empty titles, were also conferred as rewards for military services.

. The Emperor Tae-che created more than twenty kings out of his family, to each of whom was given a keun district. The kings and nobles were sometimes retained at court, sometimes remanded to their principalities.

The Chin created nine orders of kings and twelve other degrees of nobility. The Suy had nine ranks of nobility, with the prefix of places, such as Kwö, Keun, Hëen, &c., which were afterwards reduced to three, viz. Wang, Kung, and How.

The Tang, in the sixth century, had nine degrees of nobility, like those of the Suy; the princes of the blood were styled Tsin-wang.

The founder of the Sung dynasty (A.D. 950), who slighted military affairs and honoured learning, ennobled all his ministers, to whom he gave the title of Kwö-kung, in contravention of a law passed in the Han dynasty, that no man could be ennobled without military merit.

The Ming (Chinese) dynasty lavished titles profusely amongst the imperial family, including even the princesses: these titles are called Ming-ke, "fame utensils;" they have been given, says the author, sparingly by succeeding dynasties, on the principle that "titles easily obtained lose their value in the eyes of the people."

The five common titles of nobility are explained as being derived from certain virtues; as some of our heraldic writers pretend to deduce armorial distinctions from moral qualities. The highest of the existing order is the Kung, so called, it is said, from a generous regard to the public or general good, in opposition to selfishness; this being considered the highest virtue; to understand which, it is necessary to analyze the character kung, which is compounded of pă, to turn the back upon, and sze, selfish: denoting the opposite of that which is selfish and unjust. The second order, or How nobles, are those who, being repelled for their virtues, yet wait, patient and persevering, amidst suffering, for better times. How signifies a target, the character of which is compounded of a man extending a cloth, and an arrow hanging from it. The third order, or Pih nobles, are "bright men," as the word denotes; i.e. seniors possessing a high degree of intelligence. The fourth order, or Tsze nobles, are those capable of nurturing and training up other persons in virtuous conduct: the word tsze signifies literally, or rather radically, child. The fifth and last order consists of the Nan nobles, who are "capable of sustaining the burden of important offices manfully, and thereby giving repose to others:" the character nan is compounded of two radicals, teen, a field, and lëih, strength.

The original author closes his disquisition upon the nobility of China by enumerating a few examples of those who have "humbly declined being ennobled."

CALCUTTA.

OBSERVING, in an Indian periodical work,* commendations bestowed upon a poem which we had never seen, entitled "Calcutta," published in this country many years ago, + which is described by the editor of that work as affording a remarkably correct and happy picture of the passing scenes and feelings of an Indian life; we sought out the work, and with some difficulty found it. A perusal of it justifies us in pronouncing it a very amusing production. It is of a satirical character, and accompanied by copious notes explanatory of its allusions; but the satire is harmless, and the verse which conveys it is smooth, and occasionally elegant. Two speakers are introduced, discussing subjects familiarly propounded, after the manner of the Latin satirists, in two dialogues: this form was adopted, says the author, "as it afforded the best opportunity of compassing, in a desultory manner, a variety of unconnected topics, which the order and arrangement of more formal composition would have associated with difficulty." We shall not render an unacceptable office to our readers by devoting a few pages to a review of this poem, which escaped notice by London critics at the period of its publication.

Of the interlocutors, one is exhibited as a youth recently from England, and destined for the civil service, who is in his griffinage, full of extravagant but disappointed hopes, and fond of pleasure; the other is an individual who has become habituated to the manners and climate of India by long residence there; he feels, nevertheless, an anxiety to return to his father-land. On being reproached by the latter with "viewing subjects with distempered eyes," and "laying a burthening stress on paltry evils," the griffin breaks out thus:

Curse on the ship in evil hour that bore My jolted frame to India's burning shore! An inauspicious hour, from which I date The bitter torments of a wretched fate: Deluded, listening to the tales they told, Lands rich in mines, and rivers streaming gold; Whence twelve short years, in Luxury's lap beguiled, Would bear me homeward, Fortune's favourite child, To pass my days in some secure retreat, Or grace the mazes of St. James's Street. Even then, in fancy drawn with bays or roans, I seized the reins, and rattled o'er the stones; While, dressed in Sunday trim, the tradesmen's wives Exclaimed: " sweet gentleman, how well he drives!" Or pleased amid Arcadian bowers I stood, Where fancy waved around the towering wood: A mansion too, some classic artist's pride, Rose on the banks of a meandering tide, A well-known spot, where endless feasts invite The neighbouring squire to hospitable rite. Oh! fond delusion! prospects nursed in vain, The rude creation of a thoughtless brain! A visionary image, formed to shun The melting gaze of India's fervid sun!

Now,

* The Oriental Observer, No. I. for February 1827, published weekly; a work which, as far as we can judge from a first number, is likely to be popular in Indla.

Calcutta, a poem, with notes. London, 8vo. 1811.

A new comer from Europe is, for the first twelve months, denominated at Calcutta a griffin-

Now, sad reverse! the rich delusion flies. House, park, and carriage, vanish from my eyes! Condemned, alas! twelve tedious years to burn. Nor dare the vast expenses of return, When all the savings of attentive care Would scarcely buy a cabin eight feet square: Content in England with a single room, And solitary nag without a groom. Alas! twice ten revolving years,* or more, Must prudence guide the helm and swell the store. Not one rupee in useless frolic spent, And steady interest at eight per cent., Ere, scorched and fried, from India's shores I fly, And taste the sweetness of my native sky: Then, recompense of past laborious days, A snug estate might solace life's decays. Yet, ah! what spot reflection can exclude, Or soothe the sad emotions that intrude? Who then remains of all the numerous band That called me "friend," and grasped the willing hand? Perhaps in pensive silence I may tread The honoured turf where rests a parent's head, Recalling to my mind, with many a sigh, The eager fund embrace, the last good-bye, Affection's warmest wishes as I sailed, The eye that uttered and the tongue that failed.

His friend reminds him that eminence must be attained by study and application, "housed up all day with moonshee at his side." The other replies:

> Sad mortifying thought, that steals away The fairest prospects of a future day! For late, as eager to employ my time, And learn the hated language of the clime, With studious toil to well-brushed books papplied, I scorned the task, and cast the page aside: And shall I then the hapless toil repeat, While Hadley's works lie sprawling at my feet? Shall jargonists repress the rising snore, Or dreams of Gilchrist, prostrate on the floor? Avaunt ve lexicons, and essays sage! For visiting and fun my thoughts engage: Long is the list of those whose spacious hall Ne'er saw me at a dinner or a ball; Of those who, pleased th' attentive card to see, Would hope "the honour of my company." Delicious thought! with nods and simpers blest, And gracious smiles that penetrate the breast! Perhaps at evening, with importance big, The Courset might see me grinning in my gig;

E'en

 &quot;Twenty-five years may be taken as the period in which a civil servant may regularly acquire, with proper habits of economy, an independent fortune in India."—Marquess Wellesley's Minute on the Cuteutto Colleges, sec. 42.

† The library, in India, has many subtle insinuating enemics, which penetrate into books, and devour the leaves. Their ravages are best prevented by brushing the volumes occasionally.

† The favourite place of resort during that short period when the absence of an intolerable sun liberates the captive "beauty and fashion of the presidency" from a wearisome day of confinement. It is the scene of various gradations of equestrian grase, and charioteering excellence—the very Rotten Row

305

E'en senior merchants, flocking down to meet The fair arrivals by an English fleet, Might view me fill the honourable place, And gape unpitied at the stranger's face.

A. Your palkee cools beside the shadowing wall, And eight stout bearers* wait their master's call; Waked from a sound repose the frisky group Beneath the labouring poles will joy to stoop, Try their best trot along the dusty road, And puff and groan and grunt+ beneath the load. Yet fiercely darting on the wooden frame. Each ray shall scorch you as an angry flame. And cloudless bursts the beam that proudly mocks The stifling shelter of your feeble box. Unseasoned vet, a thicker volume runs Through your full veins and tempts inflaming suns, t And now, with thirst, with heat, with bile o'ercome, How fares the daring sportsman at Dum-Dum, Some zealous youth, by keenest ardour led, Gun in his hand, and chatta o'er his head? Fast as he labours in the burning chase, The frequent handkerchief salutes his face. An iron frame were fruitlessly bestowed, When burns and boils within the bilious load; When rapid fever riots in the vein, And fierce delirium crowds the tortured brain. On sickness' couch how dearly shall he pay For the short frolic of a burning day-To fall, perhaps, each vain prescription tried. For quails and snipes an hapless suicide! B. I hat pe ground with pyramids oppressed,

Where ashes moulder in sepulchral rest,
Where long effusions of the labouring pen
Weep o'er the virtues of the best of men,
And fond affection rears the pond'rous stone
To worth and wisdom, plucked at twenty-one.

Far

of our Eastern emporium. Much amusement might be derived from a calm survey of this darling lounge; but, alas! the season of peril is not the time for observation—and woe to the wheels of the unfortunate speculatist, who includes curiosity to the neglect of his reins. Danger is never so greatly to be apprehended as on the arrival of a fleet from England—Jungentur jam gryphes equis. A six month' voyage is sufficient to efface every idea of equilibrium on horseback; and the steerage of a gig is a science not to be learned on the deck of an Indianan.

Bearers are laborious drowsy beings, employed in carrying the palkee (palankeen), &c. &c. They are richly blessed with an apathy and stupidity that seems proof against all excitements, save from that sordid love of money, which engrosses and debases the Hindoo character. Their ordinary rate may be averaged at four nilles in the hour.

† The incessant noise made by the palankeen-bearers cannot fall to be very disagreeable to a person on his first arrival, as it gives the idea of great labour and fatigue. A certain kind-hearted man, whose benevolence was wounded by these sounds of distress, very compassionately alighted from his palankeen, in his first expedition in that vehicle, and trudged on, in a burning sun, to relieve his groaning followers, who, we may presume, never understood the singular motive by which he was actuated.

4 There are those who disregard every warning of prudence, till illness lamentably establishes the folly and danger of exposure to a tropical sun. The sportsman, whose health and ardour have survived, without abstement, a hot season's shooting, will laugh at advice to relinquab pursuits which must ultimately ruin his constitution. To common sense, it is obvious, that the same causes which would prove instantaneously fatal to one man, are not likely to be perfectly harmless to another. No such difference of temperament ever existed between natives of the same country.

§ The places of Interment at Calcutta are ornamented in the true Egyptian style. The monuments have generally a pyramidical form; and, like the sepulchres of the Romans, salute the eye of the passenger on the road side. Far be that hour when black-edged cards* shall call My sorrowing friends to gather round my pall, And swell with sable pomp the gloomy way, As feebly droops the last sad evening ray.

B. Alas! the service is not what it was!
How much degen rate from those golden days,
When money streamed a thousand different ways,
When hands and pockets wisely understood
No rule of guidance but their master's good:
Ere yet we ventured honesty to sham,
And drew no profit from the low salaam;
Thought it no fault, whatever were the drift,
To take a handsome nuzzat as a gift!
Now rules and scruples all our prospects blast,
Touch but the money, and you lose your caste.

His friend recommends temperance, economy, and the saving system; the other exclaims:

What say you then? Must Britons feed on rice,

Live in mud walls, drink water, and count pice? Must we all comforts dastardly refuse. And learn the art of saving from Hindoos? And all for what? Oh, patriot's pretence! A mutton-chop in England twelve years hence! Or crawling home starved skeletons and bones, To stop our mouths and terminate our groans, Of England's joys impatient to partake, Crown our long years of famine with beef-steak! A. Nor yet so far-I hate the vile extreme; A miser's praise shall never be macheme! Steer the right course: despise a niggard care, Nor vainly search for nutriment in air. Who loves the skin-flint, who curtails his sleep, And frets his life to make a purchase cheap; Ne'er yields the fingered cash without a sigh, But praises damaged bargainst to the sky: The bustling auction eagerly attends, Saves his own purse, but poisons all his friends? Is there no medium common-sense can show 'Twixt mad extravagance and sordid woe? Why vainly chase a bubble and a shade, And yield thy very comfort to parade? Oh bliss supreme! oh enviable lot! When glows the breeze intolerably hot,

To lating

On the death of an European, resident in Calcutta, no time is lost in printing and circulating throughout the settlement a melancholy black-edged card, announcing the time appointed for the interment of the deceased, and requesting the attendance of such friends as may be disposed to accompany the body to the grave.

† An offering of money, presented to persons in elevated situations—and which the servants of the Company are very properly inhibited from accepting. Under cover of this ceremonious usage, the natives might purchase, from abandoned and rapacious men, the sanction and favour of law, on the side of fraud, oppression, and enormity. We are sufficiently conversant with the artiface and corruption of Asiatic character, to be well assured that a gift of any value is never offered without design.

* It must be acknowledged that instances of sordid parsimony are not numerous among our countrymen in Bengal. However, some dirty characters are to be found, rummaging among the small lots of an auction, and venturing cautiously into a competition for half a dozen of sour beer or execrable wine-

To keep four turbanned idlers by your chair, Merely to make a clamour, and to stare, Indulge their hankerings for a silver fork,•

And curse your Christian appetite for pork.

The unhappy griff., oppressed with the weight of enui, sighing for "a respite from blue devils, heat, and bile," is sarcastically condoled with by his more experienced interlocutor, who wishes his fits of torpor may be undisturbed by the intrusion of sircar or dun; and then draws a dejecting picture of the fate of an unmonied wight.

B. Why then on such a spot did Wellesley rear A studious seat, to Eastern learning dear, Where giddy youths a thousand channels find To drain the purse, and dissipate the mind? A. If banished far, where rocky hills salute Ganges' vast stream, and nurse the forest's root; Where wild Monghyr, in sylvan beauty fair, Boasts a cool climate, and a healthy air; Genius were yours some method to invent Of squandering cash-for money must be spent; And hours that now society allots To forms and fashions, had confirmed you sots; Had changed the dance which temp'rate pleasure leads, For tipsy reels, rough fun, and Thracian deeds; Perched you on punkah, + arbiter of feasts, Bumper in hand, the pride of kindred beasts: Or opening fast the labyrinth of vice, Plied in your deafened ears the constant dice. B. Yet here the tedious hours unvaried crawl,

B. Yet here the tedious hours unvaried crawl,
One day describes the listlessness of all:
We fume to lay, to-morrow must we reek,
The same the next day, and so on the week!
To-morrow's light shall see us pale and glum,
And muckenders shall wave for months to come:
And yet to-day, more tedious than the past,
It seems an age since, torpid and aghast,
The punctual call† at morning-gun I heard,
And o'er the plain my panting courser spurred.
Snuffed the cool air, and to the buildings sped,
When tyrant Sol upreared his dazzling head.

A. Slept you again! B. With many a drowsy nod
I paid dull homage to the sleepy God;

But

Cælum ipsum petimus stultitla.

• After a large dinner, to which every body brings his own servant or servants, it is absolutely necessary to prevent all egreess from the premises till the knives, forks, and spoons have been counted, that the suspicious herd that attends us may be searched, in case of any defalcation in the return of those articles. The servants who wait behind our chairs are Mussulmans of the lowest description, the scum of the country, who, without the slightest objection to plunder their infidel masters on every occasion, are nicely scrupious as to touching pork, or any other unclean food prohibited in the Koran.

† The punkah is an ingenious contrivance to make existence supportable in those sultry suffocating hours which not unfrequently bless the climate of Bengal. It is usually an oblong frame of wood, proportioned to the dimensions of the room, and covered with linen closely extended over it. This machine, supported by ropes from the ceiling, is committed to the care of a servant, who, cord in hand, moves the frame in a seesaw motion—and thus produces a partial circulation of air. To stride these aerial fans, has been the froile of many a bacchanallan party—

† The hard task of rising at daybreak for a constitutional ride is severely felt by those whom the heat of the night deprived of a refreshing sleep.

But nought the sofa's easy length availed, A ceaseless hum my listening ears regaled: Musquitoes swarmed around, a thirsty throng, Raised the red bump, and tuned the hollow song.

A. You rise, no doubt, in irritable plight,
And suffering servants pay for every bite:
Theirs is the luck in dumb surprise to list
Your broken jargon,* and to feel your fist;
Cuffied here, kicked there, the pond'ring blockhead reels,
And scarcely knows his headpiece from his heels.

B. What, when all dressing order they invert,
First handing you a waistcoat, then a shirt,
In the same hose your legs and arms would shove,
And scarcely know a stocking from a glove:
When steeped in bang,† so wonderfully bright,
Their wits three sable loggerheads unite,
Matured in dulness by experience long,
And perfect in the knack of doing wrong,
What man with temper cast in happiest mould
But gives his tongue free liberty to scold?

Amongst the resources of the ennuyés in India, in the first rank is the hookah, to which "fashionable and delectable pastime," says the author, "many are driven by the sheer want of occupation." The hookah is pretty well known in England; but we nevertheless subjoin the description of it given by the writer in a note, con amore: "an instrument used for smoking a particular preparation of tobacco, in the fumes of which many of our Anglo-Asiatics are constantly enveloped. That part of the apparatus in which the tobacco is deposited, communicates by a perpendicular tube with a receptacle for water, through which passes that voluminous tube or snake, which the performer holds, and from which he inhales the grateful steam. A sweet harmonious bubbling of the water is produced by the suction. The whole machine rests upon a small carpet or rug."

The old Indian expatiates upon the resources which may be found in the course and in the sports of the field, where the jackall's brush is coveted instead of Reynard's. These recreations, and the topics of conversation they afford, diminish, he says, the tedium of the time. The other party alleges that

Themes such as these the table would pollute, Where 'tis good breeding's essence to be mute.‡ Important hour, when social souls conspire To cheat the heavy moments and perspire;

And

- On the first establishment of a young man in India, some allowance ought to be made for the unfortunate domestics, whose ill fate it is to be taxed with a greater portion of stupidity than actually oppresses them. When the master is unintelligible, are the servants likely to be unperplexed?
- † The effects of bang, a preparation from the leaf of a species of wild hemp, are—"to confound the understanding, set the imagination loose, and induce a kind of folly and forgetfulness." With this common stimulant, the native servants are too apt to fortify themselves against the cares and calamities of servitude.
- ‡ That general familiarity which is said to have some years since prevailed in Indian society, has luckly lost ground at Calcutta, and has been succeeded by an observance of form and punctilio, which, in otcarried to unreasonable lengths, inclines to the preferable extreme. Society without any restraint of decorum and good breeding, is a fabric without cement. The component materials cannot long coalesce, and such divisions must inevitably occur as endanger the whole structure. As to the distressing silence of some of the tables at the presidency, of which a common complaint is made by new-comers from England, and jovial fellows from the upper provinces, it is suspected to have a main source in the climate of the lower parts of Bengal, which has sometimes a renarkable effect in deadening the reliah for social intercourse. Conversation is a fatigue when oppressive heat induces somnolency, and suipended animation is recalled only by such efforts as perhaps we have no inducement to make. The formal dinners at Calcutta are far from exhilarating, and occupy a great space of time; so that

And at some dinner, formal and immense, All shine in silence, prodigies of sense!

A. But if, too blest, at happier board you sit,
Treasure each word, nor slumber over wit;
Some new remark the weather may suggest:
"The day's been hot, and I was much opprest;"
"I thought the Course extremely warm to-night;"—
"Tis always so, I think."—"You're very right."
To pay such gems of intellect their due,
We wipe our face, and prove th' assertion true,
An anxious look around the table cast,
For other sallies vig'rous as the last.

B. Must every evening constantly repeat These dismal scenes, these agonies of heat? Doomed in a pompous stupor to impart The lofty flights of culinary art, Now on some ponderous joint I show my skill. Now from my forehead wipe the tepid rill: While reddening wounds, whence thirsty insects drew A sanguinary surfeit ere they flew, Arrest my anxious labours, and demand The fretful nail, the irritating hand. Then too the mind in bold excursion soars, And the free tongue a wordy current pours: For round the board in animating strain Starts the wild thought of fancy from the brain; Sound sober argument employs the time, Or genius towers unfettered and sublime. Ye too I thank, who, sitting at my side, With endless stores of anecdote supplied, Lords of keen raillery, who rapid stray O'er fancy's realms, and with a glance survey; Who, as your breasts with sacred ardor throb, With ecstacy inspired, pronounce, "Loll Shrob!"* Or filled with bright conceptions of the mind. Which in weak words unworthy utterance find, Content to feed upon the inward fire, From low terrestrial politics retire, And on each topic countenance bestow. By words of nervous strength-as Yes, or No! A. Some, in deep reveries and slumbers lost, Sleep off fatigue; for business will exhaust, As, perched all day on some official seat, They force long paragraphs o'er many a sheet, Brandish the pen, and deal the lib'ral ink,

While vulgar mortals in oblivion sink.

B. Yet beer that foams impatient of the cork,
Will tempt them from the labours of the dawk,
And tiffin's† welcome summons interpose
A grateful meal, a season of repose.

A. Sedate they quit the ruminating chair,

Sedate they quit the ruminating chair,
 And breathe abroad the ev'ning dust and air,

As

* Properly signifies red wine, and is the term used to distinguish claret.

1 Angliet, luncheon, may be termed the principal meal of the day. The etymology of the word I herer heard explained; nor is it of much consequence to those who do not confine themselves to the mere verbal enjoyments of this agreeable hour. With most men it has a recommendation of some weight in Indian life—partem solido demere de dic.

As dips the sun, of dazzling splendour shorn, When the wide fort resounds the evening horn. And piercing heat, by rays meridian thrown, Glows in each gun, and bursts from every stone : Though some tall building's length'ning shade between, From beams descending spread an ample screen: And planted vain in ornamental rows, Tree after tree a trifling shelter throws, What time, when, dripping with exhaling sap, The gross beer-drinker rises from his nap, And forth unanimously joyed to break The long arrest, and revel while awake: Full many a soddened form in jacket* white. Wings from the thronging Course his airy flight, Borne on the steed, or perched with whip and reins, In a dear specimen of Stewart's+ pains, Fast roll the wheels; the scise, t with equal pace, Grasps the kind aid of some befriending brace; And dragged, and whirled, with chowrie in his hand, Longs for th' attractions of the fav'rite band, When his own sahib, to harmony alive, May join the crowds deserting from the drive. And o'er the trembling drawbridge rattling hard, Rush to the pleasures of the promenade, And saunt'ring gently o'er the burning flags, Flirt with the fair, and frolic with the wags, No time so hot; for through the spacious square Floats the unnerving breath of sultry air. And ev'ry building, to its centre warm, Gives a dull languor to the evening calm. Meanwhile the sparks, who sober haunts prefer To music's charms, and scandal's busy stir. Far from the roving hum at evening steal. And give to drifting roads the dusty wheel.

B. Eyes and mouth closed, and head with caution bowed, When rises high in air the powdering cloud, Waked by the dancing courser's well-fed pride, Or jaded beasts to sorry hackries § tied.

A. But when hard showers the flitting atoms bind, Unfelt the dryness of a southern wind.
When louring clouds the hidden azure clog, And nought remains in season but the frog, O'er the wet marshy plain distinctly seen Chowringhee's stately buildings bound the green,

When.

• A coat is a rare sight during the hot season, to be encountered only at formal parties, when decorum requires a temporary sacrifice of counfort. Lord Cornwallis, who had a character to disregard these petty distinctions, exempted his dinner visitants from the burden of warm clothing, and, on sitting down to table, gave the word of command, "Off coats!"

† An English coachmaker settled in Calcutta, whose workmanship is very superior, and charges correspondingly high.

‡ A stable servant who accompanies his horse, and is generally capable of very great exertion. Their badge of office is a chowrie, a short stick with a tail of horse-hair attached to it, for the purpose of besting off the flies.

§ A species of covered carriage much in use amongst the natives, and usually drawn by a pair of miserable ponies, denominated tattoos.

A The prevailing wind during the hot dry season. It gives place early in June to easterly winds, which continue prevalent during the rains.

When, lost their snowy gloss* and Parian pride, A sombre yellow streaks the dripping side; And on the pillars perched, in formal gloom, The giant-argall† shakes his soaking plume; Winged scavenger, whose use the laws confess, And cherish well in gluttonous excess, As forth he stalks with military air, From carrion heaps a putrid feast to tear; Monarch of filth, to take his refuse fill 'Midst thievish crows that shrink before his bill.

The description of the concomitants of refection in the East is just to the atter; though a mere English writer would scarcely credit it:

Let then the swinish epicure confess His abject love to wallow in excess! "Drink now," he cries, "and heap the groaning board With every taste that orient climes afford." Say, do his ravished eves with transport glow. Or heavy sighs attest the glutton's woe? Alas! creative nature calls to light Myriads of winged forms in sportive flight, When gathered clouds with ceaseless fury pour A constant deluge in the rushing shower. On every dish the bouncing beetle falls, The cockroach plays, or caterpillar crawls; A thousand shapes of variegated hues Parade the table, and inspect the stews! The living walls the swarming hundreds stick, Or court, a dainty meal, the oily wick; Heaps over heaps their slimy bodies drench, Out go the lamps with suffocating stench! When hideous insects ev'ry plate defile, The laugh how empty, and how forced the smile? The knife and fork a quiet moment steal, Slumber secure, and bless the idle meal; The pensive master, leaning in his chair, With manly patience mutters in despair! O England! show, with all thy fabled bliss, One scene of real happiness like this!

The poem concludes with the following ejaculation from the elder speaker:

Oh for that happy day (compared with that, All days are joyless and all pleasures flat), When filled with boundless raptures of delight, I view low Saugor fading from the sight; Hail in the welcome breeze a glad retreat From shores that glisten with eternal heat, And, as the bellying sails distended swell, To heat and India bid a long farewell!

Where

The beautiful effect produced by a composition termed chunaum is utterly lost during the wet months, which greatly disfigure and de-den the brilliant coating of the noble houses about Calcutta.

This filthy bird, commonly called adjutant, from his well-measured and stately stride, is of such great utility in Bengai, that persons destroying it are subjected to a severe penalty. It removes all that missance which in so hot a country might be productive of pestilence. In appearance it is unseemly and disgusting. The craw is red, naked, and pendulous; the bill of great length and strength. When text, this bird seldom reaches five feet. Mr. Ives secretained the extent of wings of one to be fourteen feet ten inches.

MARCH.

Where milder suns on happier seasons shine, Be Britain's isle and British comfort mine: Where kindred ties the passing hour endear, Prompt the glad smile, and wipe the falling tear: Where Liberty with Justice reigns entwined, And wakes to life the virtues of the mind; Where pure Devotion pours her heaven-taught prayer, And awful piles a rev'rend aspect wear, Their sacred spires amid the prospect smile, And speak in grateful praise the favoured isle; Unseen the barb'rous rite, the frantic train, Unheard the shout that frights the idol fane! Sweet is the view where nature's bountous plan Owes a last polish to industrious man! Dear land! the best of thoughts where'er I stray, At night my vision, and my theme by day.

PUBLICATION OF EASTERN WORKS IN ENGLAND.

To the Editor of the Asiatic Journal.

Sia: I am happy to observe, from your publication (p. 183), that the Asiatic Society of London are about to patronize the republication and translation of oriental works in England. This plan realizes in part the idea of the late excellent and learned Mr. Ward, whose observations I beg to subjoin, as they powerfully recommend the Society's project.

The author would recommend that a Society should be formed, either in Calcutta or London, for improving our knowledge of the history, literature, and mythology of the Hindoos; that after collecting sufficient funds, this society should purchase an estate. and erect a pantheon which should receive the images of the most eminent of the gods, cut in marble-a museum to receive all the curiosities of India, and a library to perpetuate its literature. Suitable rooms for the accommodation of the officers of the society, its committees, and members, would, of necessity, be added. To such a society he would ventur to recommend that they should either employ individuals in translations from the Sungskritu, or offer suitable rewards for the best translations of the most important Hindoo works. On some accounts, the metropolis of British India appears to be most eligible for this design, though such an institution might, the author conceives, do the highest honour to the capital of Britain, crowded as it is already with almost every thing great and noble. The author recommends an institution of this nature from the fear that no society now existing, that no individual exertions, will ever meet the object, and that, if (which, may Providence prevent!) at any future period, amidst the awfully strange events which have begun to rise in such rapid succession, India should be torn from Britain, and fall again under the power of some Asiatic or any other despotism, we should still have the most interesting monuments of her former greatness, and the most splendid trophies of the glory of the British name in India. Another argument urging us to the formation of such a society is, that the ancient writings and the monuments of the Hindoos are daily becoming more scarce and more difficult of acquisition: they will soon irrecoverably perish. Should the funds of the society be ample, literary treasures would pour in daily into the library, and scarce monuments into the museum from all parts of India. And if it were formed in London, how interesting would a visit to such an establishment prove to all England, and to all foreigners visiting it; and how would it heighten the glory of our country! And if formed in Calcutta, how would persons from all parts of India, European and native, and indeed from all parts of the world, be drawn to it; and how greatly would it attach the Hindoos to a people by whom they were thus honoured By the employment of an artist or two from England, all the sculptured monuments of India would soon be ours, and thus be carried down to the latest posterity.

ON THE HOLINESS OF HIGH PLACES.

It is curious to remark the universal consent of mankind in attributing a anctity of character to lofty mountains, eminences, and high places. If we earch the records of history, sacred and profane, we shall find concurrent proofs of the general as well as early prevalence of this impression, and of the incorporation with pious feelings, not merely in the multitude of supersitions which at various periods of the world have been known amongst mankind under the name of religion, but even amongst those people who had he advantage of a direct revelation of the true faith.

In the first patriarchal ages, before society had taken a distinct form, and when the arts were comparatively rude, no temples existed; the deity was vorshipped in the open air. The contemplation of the various objects on the earth and in the sky, which struck a mind intent on prayer or thanksgiving, was nfinitely better calculated to nourish devotion than the most majestic pile, consecrated to holy purposes, but where the greatness of the object would apnear to be limited. Hills and mountains naturally attracted such individuals, for there the works of the Deity could be best contemplated; their elevated nosition, the silence and tranquillity which reigned in such spots, were favourable to their purposes. It is well known, says a French theological writer, that the natriarchs so worshipped the true God in the early ages; the Almighty consented to this mode of worship, because it was most convenient to the nomade pastoral life of those holy personages. He adds, however, that if this mode were the best, and most conformable to the notions of genuine worship (which is maintained by some modern writers), God would never have permitted a change amongst his people; and it would follow from the argument in question, that savage nations who thus worshipped, were wiser than more polished ones, and that mankind in their infancy had more light in this respect than at a more advanced period.

That the practice was countenanced by the Deity appears not only from the command given to Abraham to sacrifice his son on a mountain, afterwards called "the Mount of the Lord;" but from the express declaration that lloreb, "the mountain of God," was "holy ground;" and from the sacred character imparted to Mount Sinai by its becoming the scene of conference between Moses and his Maker.*

Before the erection of the tab nacle by Moses, there is no mention of any covered edifice of worship in the Old Testament. This circumstance must not be solely attributed to the poverty and rudeness of the people in preceding times. Although their pursuits were pastoral, we read of a city built by Cain, and named after his son Enoch; and soon after the deluge, Babel or Babylon is mentioned, together with Nineveh, Resen, and various other cities (Gen. x.). A learned writer remarks that "the state of society in the time of Abraham argues its long previous existence. Powerful kingdoms were already established; great cities had been built, and regular armies were maintained. Mankind already witnessed the pomp of courts and the luxury of individuals. Pharaoh appeared surrounded with his princes; Abimelech came attended with the captain of his hosts; and Abraham himself was rich in gold and silver, in tents, in flocks, and in herds. Money, and even coined money, was in use; nor let it be forgotten, that slavery was already introduced." It would hence appear that it was not owing to the low state of the arts, that buildings were not erected for public worship of the Deity.

\* The heathers had their theopsy, or sight of the gods, for which eminences were favourable. Asial  $\hbar$  Journ. Vol. 25. No. 147. 2 T

Herodotus (l. ii. c. 4) and other ancient authors, Christian as well as Pagan, state that the Egyptians were the first people who erected temples, or enclosed places of worship. Modern writers, however, maintain that the tabernacle built by Moses in the wilderness was not only the first temple dedicated to the true God, but the first edifice of this kind ever constructed. The primitive signification of the word translated "temple," in the Holy Scriptures, is enclosure, consecrated ground. Altars had previously been erected: Noah built an altar to the Lord, on which he offered burnt offering, immediately upon his exit from the ark.

It is supposed by some that idolatry, or rather paganism, did not prevail before the deluge; but Maimonides and other distinguished rabbis held the contrary; they are of opinion that the antediluvians were Sabæans, or worshippers of the host of heaven. It is evident from the Scriptures, that when Abraham received his call, four centuries after the flood, mankind had fallen off from the pure worship of the Deity. Rabbinical authors accuse Ham, the son of Noah, of inventing or renovating Sabæism. This charge is repeated by Greek and Arabian writers, who identify him with Zoroaster.

The Sabæan worship led to the veneration of high places as the seats of that worship. The early Sabæans were doubtless astronomers, and hills and mountains were observatories, whence the motions of the heavenly bodies were regarded. At a later period, we are told by Petronius (c. 88) that Eudoxus, a celebrated Greek astronomer, of whom Strabo speaks (l. xvii.) "in cacumine excelsissimi montis consenuit, ut astrorum calique motus deprehenderet." This rational pursuit, however, instead of being cultivated solely as a science, degenerated into a superstitious worship of the sun, moon, and stars, which, it is generally believed, was the first false religion introduced into the world. In process of time these "high places" began to be peopled with divinities; and we find the servants of Benhadad, king of Syria (I. Kings, xx. 23) telling him that the gods of the Israelites are "gods of the hills," and recommending, therefore, a battle on the plains.

"It is incontestable," says a French writer, "and many learned men have established the fact, that the most ancient idolatry was the worship of the heavenly bodies. Moses forbade it to the Israelites, and it is the only one spoken of in the book of Job (xxxi. 26). For this reason, one of the most ancient superstitions was that of performing religious worship on the tops of mountains, which the Holy Scripture terms 'high places:' the pagans believing that thereby they approached nearer to the abode of the gods. Are we to suppose that God wished to sanction this superstition when he ordered Abraham to offer up his son Isaac upon a mountain, and when he spoke to the Israelites on Mount Sinai? Doubtless not; God chose these places in preference to a flat country, where what passed could not be easily seen. But Moses expressly interdicted this custom to the Israelites, and ordered them to destroy all the ' high places' of the idolaters. It is, therefore, extremely probable that one of the reasons why God wished the tabernacle to be built, was to convince this people that it was not necessary to ascend mountains in order to approach him, and that he would himself deign to approach his people by rendering his presence sensible in the moveable temple erected to his honour."

Long after the use of temples, it would appear that ancient nations were not image-worshippers. According to Lucian, the early Egyptians had no idols or statues in their temples. Eusebius says that the Greeks were not worshippers shippers of images before Cecrops (A. C. 1500) who imported the worship of the Egyptian deities of that period into Attica; and Plutarch tells us that Numa prohibited the Romans from representing the Deity in the form of any animal, and that for seventy years they had no statue or painting of their gods in their temples. The Romans had no temples whatever till subsequent to the death of the founder of their city.

Other ancient nations not only used no temples, but considered the use of them inconsistent with genuine piety. Herodotus tells us (Clio, 131), from his own knowledge, that the Persians of his time had no altars or temples, the use of which they censured as impious; their custom, he says, was to offer sacrifices on the summits of the highest mountains. Cicero adds, that the Persian priests instigated Xerxes to destroy the Greek temples, because they confined within walls the Deity whose real temple was the universe. Many heathens, Zeno, Seneca, Lucian, and others, have disapproved of building temples to the deity; and even St. Paul (Acts xvii.) seems to ridicule the practice of building an edifice for God, adding, in the same words as Stephen (Acts vii. 48), that the Almighty "dwelleth not in temples made with hands."

"High places," i. e. groves, temples, and alters upon the tops of hills, are so frequently mentioned in Scripture that it would be tiresome, as it is needless, to particularize the places where they occur. The Hebrew word translated "high places," is Bamoth, and it signifies most generally places dedicated to religious worship, whether true or false. The LXX, when they do not retain the original word, as they occasionally do by translating חםם, βάμα, generally render bama and bamoth by בשחם, " a high place," or "high places." In some passages they translate bamoth by Bambis or βωμω, high or lofty altar or altars. Some of the Jewish commentators allege that where the word is understood in a bad or reproachful sense, it denotes an idolatrous grove or temple planted on a hill; where it is used in a harmless sense, it denotes an altar built to some height, and which can only be ascended by steps. In the beautiful lamentation of Saul for Jonathan (2 Sam. i. 19) the word bamoth occurs in the sense of hill or eminence: "the beauty of Israel is slain upon thy high places." In Ezekiel (xx. 29) the text plainly shews that the meaning of the word (bama) is reproachful: "When I had brought them into the land for the which I lifted up my hand to give it to them, then they saw every high hill, and all the thick trees, and they offered there their sacrifice. Then I said unto them, what is the high place (bama) whereunto you go? (or, I told them what the high place was): and the name thereof is called Bamah to this day."

The identification of these "high places" with the idolatrous worship paid to the sun and the other heavenly bodies, occasioned the Jewish legislator to prohibit, in such express terms as he has done, the people from sacrificing thereon, knowing their proneness to adopt the superstitions of the nations around them. It appears (Exod. xxvi. 30) that in his time the children of Israel had their "high places" and their "images" dedicated to the sun, or Baal, where oxen and sheep were sacrificed (Numb. xxii. xxiii.) Wherefore they were commanded (Deut. iv. 16, 19) to be upon their guard lest they should fall into idolatry, "lest thou lift up thine eyes unto heaven, and when thou seest the sun, and the moon, and the stars, even all the host of heaven, shouldst be driven to worship them and serve them." They are, moreover, commanded (Deut. xii. 2) to "utterly destroy all the places wherein the nations served their gods upon the high mountains and upon the hills." Nevertheless, we find in the sacred records that mountains and "high places" were still favourite scenes of worship amongst the backsliding Israelites. "They sacrifice," says Hosea (iv. 13) "upon the tops of the mountains, and burn incense upon the hills, under oaks, and poplars, and elms." These "high places" were generally adorned with groves and plantations of trees, which were held in great veneration amongst the eastern nations, as well as the heathen of the west, and even amongst the Celtic and Teutonic tribes of the north, owing to the deep and solemn gloom those groves produced, which was so favourable to the mysterious character of the worship they acknowledged. The woman of Samaria tells Jesus (John iv. 20): "Our fathers worshipped in this mountain;" which our Saviour seems to condemn, by his remark, "ye worship ye know not what."

One of the reasons alleged for the resort of pagans, and especially the star-worshippers, to lofty places, was that there they were nearer to the objects of their adoration. This seems, at first, a puerile motive, but we find it expressly so alleged by Tacitus (Ann. l. xiii. 57), who speaks of places deemed "maxime propinquare coclo, precesque mortalium a dits nusquam proprius audiri." A more plausible motive is one already referred to, namely, the retirement and tranquillity which are to be found in high situations, especially when embosomed in trees.

It is material to our purpose to remark that the Jewish proseuchæ, or oratories, even in the time of our Saviour, were often situated on mountains, and surrounded with trees; sometimes they were placed by the side of rivers (Acts xvi. 13), for the convenience of ablution and purification. Thus, it is said of our Saviour (Matt. xiv. 23) that "when he sent the multitudes away, he went up into a mountain apart to pray; and when the evening was come, he was there alone." The transfiguration (Matt. xvii. 1) took place in a "high mountain," where the three disciples had a vision of Moses and Elias. The "high place" and "hill of God" spoken of in Samuel (1 Sam. ix. 12, 13; x. 3, 5) is probably a synagogue, or a proseucha, which was distinguished from a synagogue in not being covered. The "great high place," on which Solomon sacrificed at Gibeon (1 Kings, iii. 3, 4), seems to have been a relic of pagan superstition, consecrated, however, by the King to the service of the true God.

It probably arises from feelings similar to those which dictated worship upon an eminence, that oriental nations often pray upon the tops of their dwellings. Peter, it is said in the Acts (x. 9), "went upon the house-top to pray; and Mr. Ward, in his "Illustrations of Scripture from Hindoo Manners and Customs," remarks, upon this passage, that "some of the rich Hindoos have a room on the top of the house, in which they perform worship daily; and the roofs in India, being flat, are often used for the purposes of worship by individuals."

It is curious to trace the etymology of the words which denote scenes of worship in the Greek and its derivatives, which, we shall find, contain a distinct allusion to the fact, that anciently adoration was paid to the Supreme Being from heights. The Greeks derived their word Βωμος, altar, from the Hebrew bama, high, elevated, because, the lexicographers tells us, altars were usually built on hills or rising grounds; and Eustathius, on Homer, says tha Bωμος signifies not only the material upon which the sacrifice was made, i.e. the altar, but also the elevation itself. The Latin altare was derived, says F Festus (l. I. 10) from altitudo. According to Servius (in Eccl. 5, 65) the altar was dedicated to the diss superis, the ara to the diss inferis; though classi authors do not thus distinguish them; and Grævius says (Thes. Antiq. Ron xii. 777) "ut are superis, ita antra erant diis inferis. Our altar is from the Latin altare, and it is remarked by Junius, that this word is received with Christianity into all the European languages: he adds that "altare is used by one of the fathers as appropriated to Christian worship, in opposition to the ara of Gentilism."

It would be idle to dwell upon the marks of reverence paid to "high places" amongst savage or half-civilized nations; to them every object in nature or art, which is striking or new, generates a species of devotion, the offspring of ignorance alone. But it is a fact confirmatory of the general prevalence of veneration for high places, that the two most primitive people upon ealth, the Hindoos and the Chinese, are still remarkable for this superstition. The former, besides their imaginary maha mera, or great mountain, their soomera, or holy hill, supposed to be at the North Pole, regard with sublime veneration the Himalaya, Coosh, Aboo, and all the lofty hills with which nature has discriminated the geography of that region. Even in the last number of this journal (p. 191) this fact is referred to by the writer of an account of the superstitions prevalent in the Deccan, where it is stated that the most remarkable hills in the country are rendered more so by a place of worship dedicated to some god; and that the hills sanctified by the presence of a god are numerous there. A pilgrimage to some of the snow-capped pinnacles of India is supposed to be acceptable to the Deity; and the deluded creatures who venture upon such a journey are tempted to believe that the summit of some of them is a stepping-stone to heaven.

The Chinese entertain a belief that "heaven made the lofty hills to be the abode of gods and spirits." Once in each year the Emperor offers a sacrifice on a mountain, accompanied by his grandees. The holy mountains in China are not few in number. The Tac-shan, or Tung-yö, in the province of Shantung, is a very lofty mountain, and considered the highest in China. It is said that on its summit is the idol Shing-moo, or the holy mother; and it has been at various periods an object of worship. The Kwan-lun, north-west of China, in Central Asia, said to be the centre of the world, is a mountain highly celebrated amongst the Chinese, who consider that the Teen-te, or ruler of heaven, there holds his court.

Besides the motives already assigned for the tendency of superstition towards elevated spots, we may reckon the proneness of mankind in all ages to regard whatever is lofty, vast, and difficult, with ideas akin to the sublime. Those parts of earth which the clouds rest upon and envelope, where vegetation shrinks from a contest with perpetual frost, and where nature seems to have set a limit to the enterprize of man, may well be regarded by vulgar minds as the hallowed abode of superior beings. Moreover, the rarefaction of the air in these altitudes produces an influence upon the human lungs which favours the illusion, some attributing the effect to a poisonous air generated by demons, others to the purity of the element, which is suited only to the constitution of those who can breathe the ether of the gods.

THE BRITISH TERRITORIES IN THE DECCAN.

(Concluded from p. 194.)

On the fall of Ahmednuggur to the Moguls in 1598, the Nizam's territory was divided between Mullik Umber, an Abyssinian slave who had risen to great influence, and a Hindoo chief. The former possessed the countries stretchine from Telingana to within a few miles of Ahmednuggur, and also of Dowlata. bad. The latter held from that fortress northward to Guzerat, and southward to within twelve miles of Ahmednuggur; but he was dispossessed in 1603 hv Mullik Umber, who established his power over the greatest portion of the ancient possessions of the Nizam's government. Mullik Umber was as great a warrior as a statesman, and successfully opposed the Moguls during the whole of Jehangeer's reign, and prevented them from recapturing the eastern districts, which he had recovered on the death of Akbar in 1605. His name is preserved in this part of the Deccan as the benefactor of the people of his time, while his wisdom is the theme of the legends of the country. He is said to have fixed the rent of land, to have established the Bullootees, and to have benefited the country by other wise regulations. In a Mahratta legend which narrates events that occurred about the year 1618, he is stated to have doubled the revenues of government, at the same time that he improved the condition of the people. His country became so flourishing that we are not surprised to find him described to be the soul by which the princes of the Deccan were kept together, to oppose the invasion of the imperialists in 1616: nor that when he was descrited by his confederates he stood out alone, and preserved, in a great battle near Asseerghur, in which he himself was wounded. the independence of the Deccan. On his return to Dowlatabad after his victory, he struck a gold coin with this inscription: "Barayab Derah uganec Mullik Umber Chingeez Khanee," signifying "Mullik Umber Chingeez Khance, the favourite of heaven."

The Deccan princes, inspirited by his conduct, again leagued in 1619 and overran Candeish, which had been completely subdued by Akbar; but they retired before the imperial armies to their own countries, and did not establish their authority. Mullik Umber had ample leisure, therefore, to make that revenue settlement which he effected in the greatest portion of his territories between the years 1605 and 1626, when he died, in the month of May, at the advanced age of eighty years.

The name of Toodur Mull is known to every one who is at all read in the financial history of India. He was the author of a system of taxation on the land which has preserved his fame, and added to that of the great Emperor Akbar. The conquests made by that prince in the south of India brought under his rule so vast a population of Hindoos, that it became as much a consideration of policy, as we may from the character of Akbar conceive it to have been one of inclination, to pursue such a mode of administration as would conciliate the affections of his people, and secure by means of promoting their happiness and comfort their permanent subjection to his throne. His innovations always had in view the good of the people, as well as the advantage of the state; and we are justified in supposing Toodur Mull's plan must have embraced both these objects, otherwise that it would not have been adopted by Akbar.

Mr. J. Grant, in his sketch of the Northern Circars, states that the ultimate point of perfection aimed at in the revenue department by Toodur Mull, was to form a rent-roll on the actual measurement of the lands of exactly onefourth of their full annual produce, shared with the husbandman, to be paid into the royal treasury in specie, according to the number of beegahs or extent of ground in cultivation, distributed into four classes, expressive of the nature of the soil, and to be invariably rated by a medium then struck of the real value of the several productions throughout the year, as ascertained on the spot. This was called the jummabundy nekudy, or money settlement, and the farms so rented were denominated rukba.

The aim of Akbar's financier seems to have been to frame a system of assessment which should make it the interest of cultivators not to throw up their lands on slight grounds of dissatisfaction, and thereby to ensure to the treasury a more constant source of supply, while the condition of the people who yielded it should be improved, and their attachment to the government secured.

Mullik Umber, as he flourished immediately after the adoption of Toodur Mull's plan in the rich countries of Guzerat, Bengal, &c., probably received the first hint of his system from that of Toodur Mull's. The ground-work of both systems was a knowledge of the extent of land and of its produce, and the greatest advantages which both these statesmen produced, or calculated on producing, was evidently to render permanently nugatory the loss to which government probably had before been frequently liable from the fluctuating occupancy of land by yearly lessees, and from the frequent ruin of hereditary occupants (if any such existed), by the imposition of a variable taxation.

Such a plan was consistent with natural and general principles. Land is valuable to its owner in proportion to the labour he can himself, or can induce others on his account, to bestow on it, for it yields few productions without labour. That prince (or rather proprietor), therefore, whose country was better peopled than the country of his neighbours, would be richer than they. Riches give power (especially to sovereigns); and a wise prince who was, or considered himself to be, the proprietor of the soil of his kingdom, would readily perceive that his ambition would be best gratified by an indulgent consideration towards (even if he did not share his right of proprietorship) those who laboured on it. To gain a permanent annual supply of money, though less in any one year than oppressive conduct might have produced, was evidently the interest of an established prince (or proprietor). moderate the object of the proprietor was gained, and the interests of the cultivators protected. In being rapacious for the present, the object was gained at the expense of the comforts and the prosperity of the people, and with the sacrifice of future supplies and popularity.

The proprietor, by ill-judged exactions, risked even more, and this risk was not chimerical. In the Deccan, at least in Mullik Umber's time, where the attempts of the Moguls at universal dominion were opposed by all the riches and power of neighbouring potentates, he risked the loss of tenants, and even of his hereditary occupants altogether, who might depart and reside in the domains of another proprietor, perhaps a near neighbour, and a rival for power: an arrangement by which the proprietor should have the constant occupancy of his land was therefore a natural expedient for a politic ruler to embrace.

So far as regarded the prince, the plans of Toodur Mull and Mullik Umber placed him in a better condition than he was before; and so far as regarded the cultivators, whatever might have been the advantages, through their own deceit, or the disadvantages through the oppression of their rulers, of their former

former condition, the introduction of the new system rendered their condition comparatively excellent, by fixing a moderate limit to demand. The only essential difference between the systems was, that Mullik Umber's limit, after being ascertained in kind, was once for all fixed in money, whereas Toodur Mull's was fixed annually according to the quantity of produce of the year.

The attachment to particular spots was enhanced or created by these systems. He who before had no particular inducement to remain in one place, now sat down contented with his lot, and pleased with his rulers. He enjoyed the gratifying certainty of consigning to his offspring the fields on which he had laboured and they had played; and perhaps he indulged the harmless vanity of his name being handed down with that of his field, and of his peculiar habits and character being recorded by his descendants to the sixth or seventh generation.

This charm for remaining and becoming an hereditary possessor of land was, if not produced, at least supported by the positive advantages which attached to his condition. The land, even admitting that it was not actually his own, was still a species of property of which he could not be deprived so long as he or his sons should retain the use of their bodily powers. It, was hardly possible for him to fail of gaining a livelihood. He found himself independent of the smiles and caprices of fortune, and the feeling of his independence and excellence of condition must have increased his desire to remain in circumstances so enviable. He would be careful not to fail in his engagements to government, and common foresight would point out to him the necessity of having such an overplus as would subsist himself and his family for the year. The changes of ministry, and even of government, gave him little or no concern; these advantages were, and continue to be, far from chimerical, in a country which had long been subject to constant revolutions, and to suffer by tyranny and oppression.

The feeling which would operate in one man, and induce him to be proud of his land, of his village, and his family, would soon spread to others, and make all desirous of gaining a similar advantage; it would even arrive at, and be respected in succeeding generations by the sovereign himself. He who considers himself entitled to respect, and who finds it yielded by his equals, generally inspires even his superiors with a sentiment of the same kind towards him. A prince would venerate a man whose ancestors one or two hundred years ago had ploughed the same field as he then occupied; and would regret the ejectment of such a person from his land if he failed in one, or even for several years, to perform the engagements by which his ancestors acquired their proprietary right.

Thus there exists a feeling in favour of Meerassadars, which though it has not extinguished the knowledge, has frequently arrested the exercise of right. There is not a Meerassadar in the country at the present day who would dispute the title of government to take his lands from him on failing in his engagements to pay the rent; but he would feel deeply mortified if the government should, under a very long period (at least one generation), allow or order the potail to assign away his land in meerass to any other person. In fact, no potail will, without a positive order, constitute Meerassadars to lands formerly held as meerass by a family extinct for many years. But this aversion on the part of the potails is cherished by their own self-interest, which I shall hereafter shew to be quite at variance in these times with the meeras system.

It may easily be conceived, that the same causes which operated with Mullik Umber or any sovereign, in inducing him to confirm to old occupants, and to resign to new, the hereditary possession of the lands of his dominions, were

were calculated to bring to view the propriety of permitting the transfer or sale of such rights to others. Though transfer always appears to have been made with the knowledge and approval of the government, or its authorized village servants, yet the intimation to them of the transfer was not perhaps obligatory, and was only made in compliment; or more probably to prevent litigation or dispute about the sale, by acquiring the evidence of a public functionary to its enactment. I have remarked, that the enjoyment of meerass rights was prohably exceedingly sought after; it is not to be supposed, therefore, that any one would willingly part with them after he had once acquired them, excepting under circumstances of the greatest necessity; probably a total incapacity to pay the government rent. That a purchaser should stand forth to acquire rights which were originally given for a small present, proves both that the government rent was either fixed, or a certain assurance felt of its never becoming too exorbitant,* and that the title of Mcerassadar was in great demand. If it was wise to give up land, so as to constitute it meerass, it was certainly politic to enhance the value of the arrangement by allowing land to become an object of competition; and by permitting those who had failed in their endeavours, to go off with some means of subsisting themselves, until they should arrive at another village or country, and enter anew the paths of labour in another capacity.

The agreement between government and a Meerassadar, according to the notion now entertained regarding it, is, that the Meerassadar and his heirs shall hold, on the payment of his rent, the exclusive possession of a certain portion of land: that he shall pay this rent whether he cultivated the land or not, and whether the season be good or bad; and if he should fail in discharging it, that he shall give up the possession of the land thenceforward. Thus, in so far as regards the government, the assignment of land in meerass is an act which places it totally beyond its control; unless indeed it should nullify the property, by exacting a rent not equitable, and which the Meerassadar could not withstand for many years without being ruined: and this power which government considers, and Meerassadars concede, to be its prerogative, is essentially the only bar perhaps to the Meerassadars of the present time being considered proprietors in every sense of the word. If Toodur Mull and Mullik Umber fixed the rent, they evidently abolished this prerogative, and the Meerassadars of their time would be actual proprietors.

Mullojee and Wittojee Bhonsley, two Mahrattas of the village of Hingeney Berdee, and Denulgaum Garra, in the Patus turruf of the Poona sooba, removed from that village to Eronb (Ellora), and after being occupied there in their professional capacity of cultivators for two or three years, they entered in A.D. 1578 the service of Sookjee Jadoo Rao of Sindkera, a chief of note of the Nizam's government. Mullojee had a son born to him in 1592, whom he called Shahajee.

Gaining here a military spirit, and becoming discontented with their immediate master for a breach of his word, in not marrying Jejee his daughter to Shahajee, the brothers in A.D. 1600 left Jadoo Rao's service, and appeared in A.D. 1604 as joint leaders with Jugapal Nimbalkur of a band which in an inroad to the very capital required justice from the Nizam's government, by obliging Jadoo Rao to marry Jejee, his daughter, to Shahajee, son of Mullojee, her betrothed husband.

A trifling acknowledgment to the sovereign, and a small present to the potalis and district officers, is all that was taken. Little as this was, however, a strong argument perhaps could be raised on the fact to prove Mecrassadars actual proprietors.

Asiatic Journ. Vol. 25. No. 147. 2 U

The Nizam forced Jadoo Rao to perform his engagement, and took Shahajee into his service. Afterwards he was advanced by Mullik Umber, in A.D. 1618, to the command of a body of horse, and received in jagheer for their support the district of Juneer, and the forts of Seoneer and Chacun. But Shahajee did not long enjoy in peace his good fortune: Mullik Umber died in 1626, and his son Futty Khan was unable to preserve the authority of his father. Mortiza Shah the second liberated himself from Futty Khan, and Shahajee, who supported the son of his benefactor, was driven to Mahowlee by Jadoo Rao, the chief agent on the part of the local authorities of the Delhi government and of Nizam Shah in recovering his power. From Mahowlee Shahajee fled to Beejapore, where he entered the service of the government of Beejapore. His wife, then big with Sewajee, he left in Seanore (1549 Sickey, A.D. 1627) and requested the attention of Jadoo Rao to his own daughter. But the faction in favour of the Nizam lost ground on the escape of Futty Khan from Juncer, in January 1629; who having again gained possession of the government and of the Nizam's person, under the pretence that he had been ordered to do so by the Nizam, put Jadoo Rao to death.

The final reduction of the Moguls of the Dowlatabad government having been effected by Mohabit, the famous imperial general of Shah Jehan, in the month of June A.D. 1633, about two years after the famine and pestilence which raged and devastated the half of Asia, the victorious general is said to have settled the country he conquered. But the whole of the northern jagheer of Shahajee, held from the Becjapore government as far as the Bheema, continued in his possession after the Mogul conquest of Dowlatabad.

This jagheer consisted of Chacun, Poona, Desh, Soopa, Barra Muttee, Indeepore, and the twelve mountain vallies called the Mawuls, which had been assigned to him immediately after these districts were permanently wrested from their dependence on Dowlatabad by Moorar Jugdoo, the Beejapore general. The jagheer was managed by Dadajee Konddeo, a man who is described to have been wonderful for his justice and prudence, but of a very severe disposition. Konddeo took great pains to improve the resources of the country; and if we may credit his historian, there were not twenty cubits of arable land lying uncultivated in the whole of his charge.* He had also the merit of confirming the new financial system of Mullik Umber, and probably of training that swarm of Mahratta Brahmins, mentioned by Colonel Wilks to have gone at the call of Shahajee into the Carnatic about the year 1640 or 1641, for the purpose of establishing a new system of revenue administration, which embraced the institution of the offices of Daismook, Daispandee, Koolkurnee, &c.

Dadajce Konddeo put an end to his existence, when Sewajee, who with his mother had remained under his charge from the time when they were removed from Juneer to Poona, had attained his sixteenth year in 1643, owing to the impossibility of restraining Sewajee from acts of violence and oppression, to which Konddeo had a great aversion. Sewajee on this event possessed himself of the treasury of his father, dismissed from service Seedee Heekul Hubshee, a zealous officer in the interest of Konddeo, and levied new followers among the inhabitants of those mountainous districts of his jagheer skirting the Concan. He had also possessed himself by stratagem of the hill-fort of • In a Mahratta manuscript in my possession the Mawuls are described to have been in a miscrable and depopulated condition. Konddeo offered rewards for killing wolves and clearing away the woods of these districts, and soon brought them into a comparatively excellent condition.

Torna, which it appears was garrisoned by the king's troops and not under his orders, and erected the fort of Rajghur in its vicinity, where he made for himself a substantial house.

Sewajee's restless disposition was occupied in building forts, and reducing the country to the south and to the west of Poona, from the time of Konddeo's death in 1643 till 1652, when he treacherously murdered Abdool Khan, the King of Beejapore's general, and cut up his army at Purtaubghur. It would appear from the conversation which is narrated to have occurred on the meeting of Sewajee and Abdool Khan, that his conduct up to this period was only considered to be suspicious, and that though he had always evaded obeying the orders of his prince, he never till then actually shewed a direct contempt of them. After this act of open rebellion he did not remain inactive, but possessed himself of, and fortified, the strong positions where Sattara and Chundun Wundun now stand, and thence proceeded to Pannela, the hill-fort of which Colapore is the city, and there appointed Jutoo Poligar, Senaputtee and Sir Nobulce of his army, and Kanoo Mordeo, Moozumbar of his affairs.

Sewajee was not permitted to occupy Pannela quietly. The King sent an army under Afzul Khan, son of Abdool, which commenced a regular siege; but it was conducted with little skill until batteries were erected on a neighbouring hill called Pawunghur, when the fort was rapidly breached, and Sewajee was requested by his best officers to save himself by flight. He accordingly sallied out with his garrison at midnight, and cutting his way through the King's army, arrived by daybreak within a few miles of Veesaghur, where, posting half his troops in a strong position, he directed them to dispute the passage of the road, and thus allow him time to retire and arrange for defending Veesaghur with the rest of his army. This covering party did its duty on the arrival of the enemy, and disputed the pass for an hour: but it then gave way, and was cut to pieces. This success, however, was not attended with the further discomfiture of Sewajee, who had effected his safe arrival in Vecsaghur, for the King's troops found it impossible to act against him owing to the jungles that surrounded the fort, and from the scarcity both of water, provisions, and forage in its vicinity.

Sewajce, on the retreat of the enemy, paid his devotions to the Devi of Colapore, and thence proceeded to Poorunder, where he instituted those appointments which, on his assuming the character of a prince, were denominated the Asht Pradhans. The names of those who first filled these offices are recorded by the Mahrattas with scrupulous precision. This step towards a regular management of his conquest was probably indispensably required to secure himself on the ground he had attained; it tended perhaps to give consistence to his power, splendid hopes to his more powerful adherents, and to inspire his soldiers with respect to his person.

I think it very probable that Sewajee, on establishing his authority in the Concan and to the southward of Poona, kept up where before established, or introduced where not, the first step towards a fixed money rent of the new revenue system of Mullik Umber, which was the fixing a rent in kind, probably finding that its introduction was a ready means of becoming popular as well as rich. If, however, it was not generally adopted before 1652, it probably was so as soon after as Sewajee had leisure to give his attention to affairs of so much regularity.

The state of the country at this period, though not well defined in the accounts of Sewajee's rise, is nevertheless sufficiently so to let us be assured of the following fact: that the population at his command in his father's jagheer, jagheer, when he commenced his career, was greater than that of the surrounding countries. When we take into consideration the dreadful famine of 1630-31, the prudent measures of Dadajee Konddeo after that famine in giving encouragement to cultivation, and in increasing by all means the prosperity of the districts committed to his charge, and also when we consider the well-stocked treasury which Sewajee acquired on Konddeo's death,—we may be satisfied also that Sewajee was a popular leader with the Marwullees and other troops of his own caste and religion.

The independence of Sewajee on the Beejapore government was rendered less dubious by the death of Mahomed Adel Shah in 1656, and the invasion of that kingdom by Shah Jehan immediately after that event. Ali, the vizier, protector of the infant prince, though repeatedly beaten by Meer Joomla and Aurungzebe, was not totally reduced; but the government of Beejapore received a blow from which it never afterwards fairly recovered, and which led the way to its final subversion by the loss of its amassed treasures, and by the defections of jaghcerdars and chiefs, the main supporters of its crown. From 1656 to 1660 Sewajee was engaged in making partial incursions and conquests, probably in settling the affairs of his first usurpations, and in amassing wealth for any contingency that might occur. During this period we find him pushing his depredations into the Mogul and Beejapore possessions in the Deccan, and in 1657 he married three wives of three Mahratta families, which shews that he himself did not claim a descent from Rajpoot parents.

In May 1657, having plundered the city of Juneer, Mykoo Sing, the Mogul commander in Aurungabad, advanced into his country. The first operations of the imperial commander were confined to the reduction of the fort of Chacun: but after he had taken it he was diverted from his intention of advancing by a considerable body of Sewajee's troops passing him to the eastward, and threatening an incursion into the Mogul territories. The imperial commander therefore retreated, and Purtab Rao Goojier, the officer in command of Sewajee's force, gave him battle in the valley of Ahmednuggur, and after a well-fought action, in which the imperial commander lost his life, Purtab Rao put the enemy completely to the rout, and afterwards recaptured the fort of Chacun.

After this victory Sewajee continued without interruption his operations for the conquest and security of the Concan. His power in this interval was daily becoming more solid, and began to assume a permanent aspect. He had reduced many strong forts in the Concan, and he spared no pains or expense in building new ones in favourable situations; and though the general character of his wars and field movements was predatory, his arrangements for establishing his power on a firm basis were wise, and befitting the times and his purpose. On erecting the forts of Severndroog, Colaba, Suddeydroog, and Viziadroog, he equipped flotillas, and spread the terror of his name by sea aswell as by land.

It is but reasonable to conclude that the foresight which directed the extensive warlike operations of Sewajee, and was applied to the formation of offices requisite to the direction of the affairs of a government in its great details, extended also to minutiæ of revenue arrangements, and that after the formation of those appointments which afterwards swelled their holders into the Asht Prudhans, the system of a fixed rent in kind which had been introduced in the original jagheer of Shahajee was adopted throughout the new conquests.

In 1659 Sewajec fought a great battle with Roostum Khan, the commander of the Beejapore army, at Colapore, and gained a considerable booty and nany horses; which when equipped with riders, he in February of the succeeding year (1660) took with him to Mudkul, as far as which place he collected khundee. But he had just time to secure himself in Pannela by the end of April, when Siddee Jore appeared from Rajcpore with a large army, and he seized him in that fort.

Aurungzebe, piqued at the defeat of Mykoo Sing, and at the rapidity of Sewajee's movements, ordered Shaistry Khan, in 1660, to lead the grand army of the Deccan into Sewajee's countries, and to reduce him to subjection. Shaistry Khan was nine months detained before Chacun, which appears to have been considered a place highly important to possess before advancing into the heart of the Poona districts. The havildar of Chacun, who did not surrender it until there was a practicable breach in the north-east tower, was admired by Shaistry Khan for his attachment and bravery, and he had the generosity to set him at liberty. Sewajee gave him the command of Bofraulgur for his fidelity and perseverance.

From Chacun the Mogul army marched, in December 1660, to Poons, where they were received as masters by Balejee Ram Honup, daispandee, and by Sumbajee and Cowjee, the daismooks of the Sooba. A trace of the policy of the Moguls on making conquests is to be distinguished in the reward the two last received for their defection, while it also affords an example of the activity of Sewajee in punishing traitors to his cause, and in keeping up the terror of his name: these men were gifted by Shaistry Khan with the village of Murkul in enam, and they had just finished a wall round it when a detachment of Sewajee's troops surprised the place, and put them both to death. Sewajce in the mean time was making conquests, and carrying on his war with the Beejapore government: he came out of Pannela and took Wasota in June 1660, and early in 1661 plundered Rajepore and took Babolee and Praboolee. In May he conquered the country of Surya Rao Raja, and early in 1662 he attacked and defeated a Mogul commander, encamped on the Meeree hills, near Peen. And now, finding it would require all his means to resist the Moguls, he made peace in this year with the Beejapore government and gave up Pannela to effect this purpose.

In April 1663 Sewajec turned his attention to his enemy in Poona, and harassed him in various ways. In a midnight exploit with a few men, he nearly succeeded in murdering Shaistry Khan. The imperial troops lay inactive from a want of unanimity in their commanders, and perhaps from the difficulty of the service in which they were engaged; while Sewajee continued to recruit his finances by bold and sometimes distant predatory excursions. In January 1664 he plundered Surat. In February he was besieged by Jeswunt Sing in Singhur, and while there he received the tidings of his father Shahajee's death. Jey Sing took the command of the Mogul's troops in June, and Sewajee went to war with the Beejapore government in October.

The Mogul war gained new spirit in 1665, when Sewajce being pursued and besieged by Rajah Jey Sing in Poorunder, he was obliged to surrender himself to his enemy, and to take service with his conquerors.

It would be foreign to the object of this letter to enter further into the historical detail of the time when it appears probable the introduction of the new system of revenue and revenue-officers (as we now find many of the latter) occurred.

STATE OF ORIENTAL LITERATURE IN FRANCE.

(From a Foreign Correspondent.)

OAIENTAL literature has for some years past made rapid progress in France. The study of Asiatic languages has become the mode; it is not confined to those which are necessary or useful in diplomacy and commerce, such as the Arabic, the Persian, and the Turkish; French savans devote themselves to the Sauscrit, the Pali, the Chinese, the Japanese, and the Georgian, to the acquisition of which a love of science is the sole incitement.

In researches into the history and philology of the East, French scholars likewise occupy a distinguished rank amongst the literati of Europe: the Journal Asiatique, the Journal des Savans; and other periodical publications, contain abundant evidence of the labours of French orientalists. The first named work, which emanates from the Asiatic Society of Paris, appears monthly; during the past year, it has been the vehicle of communicating to the world a variety of curious articles, although it is to be regretted that the oriental texts in some of those articles are disfigured by a considerable number of typographical errors. Since last January, the Journal has taken a new form; it is now printed at the royal press, and bears the title of Nouveau Journal Asiatique; its dimensions are also increased.

Amongst the most remarkable articles contained in the twelve numbers of the Journal for 1827, are the following:-An interesting dissertation upon the writing of the Arabs of the Hedjaz, by the learned orientalist Silvestre de Sacy,* who has also enriched the Journal with other articles. Some dissertations upon the Georgian language, by M. Brosset, are curious, though the subject is dry. A memoir by Col. Rottiers of Mary, the last queen of Georgia, is highly interesting. The dissertation of the same writer, on the state of the Christian religion in Georgia and the circumjacent countries, is not entitled to the same culogium: it seems to have been written solely with the view of extolling the priests sent into Georgia by the pope, and who profess celibacy, and of disparaging the married ecclesiastics of the country. This dissertation would have been better adapted to the Paris journal entitled " L'Ami de la Religion et du Roi, and which is distinguished by the ultramontane spirit which actuates its editors. A memoir of Baron G. d'Humboldt on the separation of words in Sanscrit texts; and a sketch of the history of the Ural Cossacs, by M. Lewchine, of St. Petersburgh, must not be overlooked, any more than a memoir of your countryman, Major Tod, upon the Asiatic origin of certain tribes established upon the shores of the Baltic.

The translations from oriental tongues which have appeared in the Journal Asiatique during the last year are the following;—Some chapters of the historical prolegomena of Ibn Khaledune, perhaps the most profound of the Musulman writers of the East, which have been rendered Into French from Arabic by M. E. Coquebert de Montbret; a notice and extract of the Turkish version of the Baktiar Nameh, from the MS. in Ouïgour characters in the possession of the Bodleian Library at Oxford, by M. Amédéc Jaubert; a narrative of the expedition of Jungheez Khan to Bokhara, taken from Aboulgazi's Genealogical History of the Tartars, translated by the same person; a narrative of the first expeditions of the Turks into the Indian sea, extracted from a work entitled Maritime Wars of the Ottomans, and translated from the Turkish by Julien Dumoret; history of the Crusades under the reign of Bibars, from Arabic authors, by M. Reinaud; translations from the Hindoostanee, by M. Garcin de Tassy, the only French scholar who has devoted himself to the study of this dialect; a translation of two Mystic Odes of the Persian Poet Hatif Isfahani, by M. Jouannin, which had already appeared in the Mines de Provient; these pieces are extremely curious, and reveal in a brief compass the Sufi doctrine of the Musulmans: it is to be regretted that the text of this article abounds with typographical errors.

* This curious disquisition is given in the Asiat. Journ., vol. xxiv., p. 176 .- Ed.

These and other articles, including translations from the English and the German, do credit to the labours of the Asiatic Society and its correspondents. Unfortunately, it is said that the members of the Society are not upon terms of perfect harmony with each other. The French orientalists have their whigs and tories. It would be invidious were I to name any of the partizans of the opposition; this is a subject calculated to give pain rather than to furnish annusement. The schism is, however, prejudicial to the interests of the Society's journal; several distinguished orientalists, owing to the discord which prevails in the Asiatic Society, prefer inserting their productions in other publications, especially in the collection of memoirs of the Geographical Society, which includes many orientalists in the number of its members.

Amongst the oriental works which appeared in France during the last year may be enumerated the third volume of the Chrestomathie Arabe of the Baron de Sacy, a work of great utility to the Arabic student, since it contains pieces from different Arabic authors, thereby affording specimens of the various styles; such as Motenabbi, Abou'lala, Omar son of Faredh, Hariri and Hamadani: several curious letters are included, from the king of Morocco; the Imaum of Muscat, &c. and some addressed to Buonaparte at the period of his expedition to Egypt. Another work of a similar kind is the Anthologie Arabe of M. Grangeret de la Grange. The following works have been published at the expense of the Asiatic Society: the text of the Sanscrit drama of Sacontala, of which M. de Chezy is preparing a translation; a vocabulary of the Georgian language, by the indefatigable M. Klaproth; an Armenian poem on the taking of Edessa, by MM. St. Martin and Zohrab (a native of Armenia); and part of the text with a translation of the celebrated Chinese philosopher Meng-tseu, or Mencius, by M. Stanislas Julien.

The presence of forty Egyptians sent to France by the Pacha Mahomed Ali contributes much to diffuse a taste for the cultivation of oriental literature in Paris. These young Musulmans devote themselves with much success, under the direction of the learned academician, M. Jomard, to the study of the arts and sciences. Several of them have acquired perfectly the French language, speaking and writing it with purity. Some of them are employed in translating French scientific works into Arabic.

A periodical Arabic work was announced at Paris in the course of last year, the plan of which was as follows: each number was to consist of articles on topics of general utility extracted from publications in Europe and America, translated into Arabic; scientific European intelligence interesting to the learned of the East, and news from Asia and Africa likely to gratify the orientalists of Europe and America; original articles communicated by learned Asiatics or Africans; extracts from Arabic manuscripts in the libraries of Europe upon useful arts and sciences, furnished by orientalists; a passage upon religion translated from some celebrated writer; lastly, every number was to be accompanied by a lithographic representation of the scientific objects described. Difficulties, it appears, altogether independent of the will of the editors have retarded, and still retard, this interesting publication. Asiatics as well as orientalists must be equally interested in the realization of this project. The locality of London is perhaps better situated than Paris for its execution: the English scholars at Calcutta might with still more ease publish a journal in Persian upon the same plan; they would thereby render an important service to the Musulman population of India.

The French government has recently commissioned an individual to undertake a literary expedition into Turkey and Persia, for the promotion of oriental letters. Mr. Schulz, a young German professor, is charged with this honourable mission. He is instructed to make inquiries into the languages, the literature, the antiquities, the geography, and the history of oriental nations. His journey has already produced important results, since it is announced that Mr. Schulz has transmitted to M. St. Martin a catalogue of all the historical and geographical works that are to be found in the sixteen principal libraries of Constantinople, which comprehend some, the names of which are not even known in Europe, and others generally supposed to be lost. This important communication need only to be known in the literary world to excite intense interest.

Some of your readers may be curious to know why the ex-minister for foreign affairs (the Baron de Damas) should have selected a German for this mission, rather than a Frenchman, since amongst the young orientalists of France many might be found well qualified to execute it. In the first place, it is well known that this minister had a particular predilection for Germans, and especially for those who had abandoned the Protestant communion for the Roman Catholic. In the second place, it is not in France as in England, where natives are always preferred to foreigners: the inverse of this practice happens in the former; and as a fashion which comes from your nation possesses more attractions in the eyes of our fair countrywomen than one invented at Paris; just so more enthusiasm is felt in France in favour of a foreign scholar than for a native who, modestly confined to his study, views with a smile of pity this ridiculous mania.

Another reason which may have decided the ex-minister of foreign affairs to confide this mission to Mr. Schulz, rather than to a native of France, is, that nothing is so popular in this country as paradoxes; the certain means of attaining a high reputation here is to step out entirely from the beaten track. Now, the majority of French scholars, who have applied to the study of oriental tongues, have employed themselves in translating pieces of poetry more or less remarkable for style or sentiment. Mr. Schulz has rudely attacked these persons in the Journal Asiatique, distributing his ridicule pretty equally between the oriental poets and their translators. In his opinion, orientalists should attend only to "those great questions which relate to the history of mankind and of nature." Nothing more was required to awaken the attention of certain influential persons; they asked and obtained for this champion of sound doctrines a mission to the East!

TIMUR.

NEITHER the resistless Attila, nor the conquering Genghis Khan, exercised a greater influence over the destiny of nations than Timur. The mind is overpowered by the magnitude of his enterprizes, and dazzled by the splendour of his success. From a humble chieftain in Transoxiana he raised himself to the imperial dignity, and subjected to his sway the most powerful kingdoms of Asia. His posterity long continued to possess some of the fairest portions of that continent; and even in our own time, we have seen one of his descendants on the throne of the Moguls.

The actions of this mighty conqueror have been transmitted to posterity by two writers of very opposite characters. The one, Sherefeddin Ali, was that monarch's secretary, who accompanied him in his vast expeditions, and who enjoyed his royal confidence. The work of this writer was not indeed composed until about twenty years after the death of Timur; but then the dynasty of the latter subsisted in all its glory; we need not, therefore, be surprised that he has adopted a manner of writing most likely to testify his gratitude, and secure the continuance of the favours he received. His book is one perpetual panegyric on the memory of Timur: he suppresses, or entirely softens down, whatever might operate to the disadvantage of his hero; and he omits no opportunity of extolling the Tartar's bravery, generosity, success, and magnificence. Professing too the same unshaken obedience to the descendants of Ali, the grandson of the prophet, he considers the greatness of his master as the work of heaven; and his slaughter of nations as the punishment which fate had decreed for their heresy and wickedness.

On the other hand, Ahmed Ebn Arabshah was a Syrian (a citizen of Damascus), who had witnessed the dreadful ravages which Timur had committed in his native land. When he wrote he was surrounded by the ruins of smoking towns and villages, and daily accustomed to hear the heavy curses which were unsparingly heaped on the memory of the blood-thirsty invader. Besides, he could not look without abhorrence on one whom he regarded as a heretic, and who had zealously laboured to exterminate all the professors of the rival sect. No wonder, then, that he should give such dark colouring to the picture which he has shown of Timur. That emperor he curses heartily and often; depreciates the good, and aggravates the ill, in his character and acts; nor does he scruple, we fear, sometimes to insert whatever might gratify his own malignity by throwing contempt on its object.

The natural inference then is, that neither of the preceding historians can alone be implicitly followed. They must be compared, and from that comparison something like the truth may be elicited: the interested or grateful partiality of the one must correct the malignant bias of the other.

Whatever may be the defects of Ahmed, let us not forget that he acquaints us with many particulars which are to be found neither in his contemporary rival, nor in the Institutes transmitted to posterity by Timur himself. Scarcely had twenty years clapsed from the death of that emperor, when our Syrian historian travelled over the whole country from the Mediterranean to the Jaxartes, to collect materials for his work. In his long and arduous journey, he sought the society of all who had been personally acquainted with Timur, or who could give him any certain information respecting that Tartar's character and actions. As probably much of that information would be offered by the ministers of a sect hostile to that of the Tartars, it would assume an odious and darkened tinge. Timur was detested by the religious distalic Journ. Vol. 25. No. 147.

teachers of Persia, Arabia, and Syria; nor can we suppose that the people generally would cherish the memory of one who "gave to the winds of desolation all who ventured to resist his progress."

We intend to devote this and a subsequent article to some of the more remarkable passages in Ahmed's life of Timur, translated from the original Arabic, and so connected as to exhibit a full-length picture of the subject. In general we give the substance only; where the translation is literal, we enclose it within inverted commas.

"The birth-place of this robber, whom God shut out from Paradise! was in the territory of Cash, which is also a city about two days' journey from Samarcand. It is reported that on the very night he was born there appeared something like a helmet, which, after gliding through the air, fell to the ground and disappeared; that sparks of fire and burning ashes arose in form of a globe, so as to overshadow both the city and the plain. It is also said, that when the wretch was brought forth, the hollows of both hands were filled with recently-shed blood." Of course the soothsayers were consulted respecting these prodigies: their predictions were various, yet all had some relation to the child's future character and fortunes,—a proof that in the present, as in other cases, they were occasioned by the very events which they are said to have foretold.

According to our historian, the condition of Timur's family was mean. His father is represented to have been either a shepherd or a low mechanic. We need scarcely say that this is a slander of the Syrian; for shortly afterwards he himself admits that there existed another report, which stated that the father of Timur had been a brave officer, and high in rank, in the army of the Sultan of Khorasan, and had enjoyed the constant favour of that monarch. He acknowledges also that he had seen a Persian work which carried up the genealogy of the Tartar to Genghis Khan; but then the descent was not by males, but by females, "those tools of the devil," as he peevishly calls them, He thus continues his abuse: the extreme poverty of his parents caused the youth's circumstances to be miscrably straitened; and to make amends for the lack of Fortnne's gifts, he prudently began at a very early age to supply his deficiencies from the abundance of his neighbours; and as he was distinguished both for cunning and dexterity, he contrived to live by the profession. But he met with an accident which made him lame for life; for as he was one night about to make off with a sheep from a neighbouring fold, he was discovered by the owner. The latter saluted him with an arrow which penetrated his thigh, and occasioned the limping that accompanied him to the grave. But this grievous accident did not deter him from his favourite occupation. "He associated with about forty poor wretches, none of whom had the fear of God before their eyes," and with their assistance he committed many depredations. Yet in his lowest state of fortune, he evinced the innate ambition of his soul: he used to say that he should one day be invested with sovereign power, and prove a scourge to the kings of the earth. His companions laughed, as in appearance they well might, at his ridiculous infatuation.

One day, while absent on a predatory excursion, he lost his way, and wandered so far that he was near dying with hunger and thirst. In this lamentable state he remained a whole week, and he would have doubtless perished unless fate had raised him up a friend in the Sultan's master of horse, who was then crossing the desert. His wants were relieved; and as he proved that he was wonderfully skilled in the art of purchasing, and still more in that of treating horses, his new friend would not part with him. He was presented to the Sultan, and his knowledge of horses was extolled to the skies: he was in consequence favourably received, and placed in one of the subordinate situations in the royal stables. On the death of the master of the horse (which soon happened), he was appointed to the vacant office. Henceforward he had more frequent opportunities of gaining access to the Sultan, into whose good graces he insinuated himself so well, that he obtained the hand of that monarch's sister. But she could not forget the former degraded condition of her husband, and she often ventured to upbraid him with it. One day she irritated him by her bitter taunts to such a degree that he drew his sabre, and threatened her with speedy death if she did not instantly flee: but as she disregarded the threat, and stood her ground, he cut her down at a blow, and after wards buried her. After this atrocious deed, he could do no other than rebel against the Sultan. The name of the latter was Hussein, of the imperial race of Genghis, and the seat of his government was Balk, in Khorasan: his sway extended over the vast regions beyond the Oxus.

Ahmed now adverts to another account of the early life of Timur. After observing that according to this report the conqueror of Asia was of noble origin, he thus proceeds: -Timur was brave, generous, and of a great mind; he insensibly won the good-will of all the young nobles at the court of the Sultan, and that good-will ripened into steadfast friendship. He often joined with them in their social entertainments. One night, when according to his appointment they had met in a solitary place, and far from any one who night report their conversation to the Sultan, he confided to them the ambitious views which he had long formed. He told them that one of his forefathers had learned in a dream that a descendant of the latter should conquer vast regions, become a powerful monarch, and rule over the kings of the earth; that he himself was that fated descendant; that the time appointed for the accomplishment of the prediction was at hand; and that he was nnxions to obtain the pledge of their support whenever it should be required. They entered into his designs, and swore that they would espouse his cause, whatever might be the result. The Sultan soon heard of this traitorous conspiracy, and remembering the saying of the poet,

The throne of kings hath never stood, Unless its steps were tinged with blood, he resolved to crush the disaffection in its birth. But his intention was soon communicated to Timur, who in consequence openly rebelled. This happened between the years 760 and 770 (from A.D. 1352 to 1362), a date which Ahmed receives the more implicitly, as it was communicated to him by his master, "the most learned, excellent, and perfect doctor, the jewel and phenix of his time, the wisest of mortals, the teacher of the world, the glory of religion, the right subtle philosopher, the cynosure of the age, the guide of men, Abu Abdalla Mohammed, a citizen of Damascus, whose days may God lengthen, and whose blessing rest on Islamism and all its professors!"

This rebellion of Timur produced great mischief in the countries bordering on the Oxus. He was joined, not only by the young nobles before-mentioned, but by many others who were probably attracted to his standard by the hope of plunder. But their excesses in one quarter soon received a check: all who had possessions to defend in Transoxiana, arose, united their strength, and forced the robbers over the river. The vast deserts which the latter found on the other side served as a secure retreat, from which they made frequent incursions into the neighbouring countries.

In this second, as in the former relation, some reason must be assigned for the well-known lameness of Timur, and accordingly Ahmed soon fluds one. which differs in some respects from the other. Here he is said to have been saluted with two arrows by the shepherd whose property he was carrying away-one in his thigh, the other in his shoulder: he was in consequence so dreadfully wounded as to be unable to mount his horse, or to offer any resistance against his seizure. In this lacerated state he was brought before Malik, the sultan, who had heard much of his ravages, and who wished to rid the peaceful inhabitants of so formidable a scourge. He was first whipped. then ordered to be crucified, -a sentence which would have been immediately executed had not the son of that monarch compassionated his condition, and obtained for him a reluctant pardon. There his wounds were healed; and it is said that while he continued at Hor he rendered some service to Malik. in extinguishing the rebellion of a powerful chief; but he soon left the court. and recurred to his favourite occupation beyond the Oxus. Others again sav that he remained with Hussein until the death of his father; and that with the ample patrimony he then received, he commenced his predatory career.

Such are the various accounts of the youth of Timur as given by our historian. They bear little resemblance to those of Sherefeddin, whose encomiastic narration, as before observed, is as little deserving of implicit credit as the malignant one of Ahmed. We continue to follow the latter historian.

After Timur and his followers had passed the Oxus, " to war against God and his apostle," he instigated them to assault the fortified town of Naksjeh, which promised to be an excellent retreat for them in time of need, and which, besides, abounded with all the necessary means of war. But on this occasion his temerity almost proved fatal to him and his three hundred followers. They had fearlessly penetrated into the town, and had massacred numbers of the inhabitants; but they were at length surrounded by such a multitude of enemies, that their destruction appeared inevitable. In this critical situation he lost not his presence of mind; he called on his intrepid band to cut their way through the dense ranks opposed to them, and thereby to regain the gate at which they had entered. " They accordingly rushed along with the impetuosity of the lion,-yea more swiftly than the descending storm;" and notwithstanding the intervening obstacles, they reached the gate, which they fortunately found still open, and with scarcely any loss they retreated to their usual station. "Despise not the cunning even of a feeble enemy; the wolf has sometimes foiled the lion."

The followers of Timur were now habituated to toil and danger, and were eager to undertake the most perilous adventures, provided any advantage were to be gained by successful bravery. From the fortified village which they occupied, they set at defiance the desultory hostilities of Hussein, whose straggling detachments they often succeeded in destroying. The boldness of the rebel rose with his success: he either persuaded or compelled the two governors of Balaksjan to renounce the authority of the Sultan, and to acknowledge him as their head; and soon a wider career of ambition was opened to him. Hussein was attacked and defeated by the Moguls, who compelled him to seek for safety in a precipitate flight. Timur entered into an alliance with the conquerors, from whom he obtained not only a reinforcement to carry on the war, but permission to retain whatever conquests he might make, He accordingly advanced at the head of his now increased forces towards Kagagan, and the terror of his name swiftly preceded him. The Sultan had assembled another army, and was resolved again to risk the fate of a battle. The two armies met at a chain of mountains, over which lies a narrow path: this path winds over the heights, and frequently along the brink of dreadful precipices; in the middle is a strongly fortified pass. It was in possession of the Sultan, who had in consequence a great advantage over his enemy: so much so, that when the latter had penetrated into the defiles, he found that he had been drawn into a snare—that he was surrounded by the troops of the former. He encouraged his followers to attempt another path, which was known to few, and by those few deemed impracticable. It lies over ridges so high " that no human feet has ever trod it, nor has it ever been visited by the wild birds of Cathay." All night they led their horses along the steep and perilous way; but at break of day they perceived, to their inexpressible consternation, that their wanderings had brought them near a large body of the enemy who occupied a strong position above them. To advance was certain destruction; to retreat would only lead them to the entrenchment of the foe: and to remain where they stood was only to await their death from the soldiers above them. In this extreme emergency the genius of Timur saved them. He ordered them to dismount, to turn their horses to graze, and to lie down as if to betake themselves to rest after the heavy fatigues of the night; they did so, just as the enemy were preparing to mount and to pass down the very path which they had scarcely left. The latter perceived them, but conceiving that they were a straggling party of comrades, passed them without molestation. No sooner had this manœuvre put them in possession of the very advantage which the enemy had quitted, than they mounted, rode after the unsuspecting soldiers of the Sultan, attacked them with fury, and made a terrible carnage among them. The Sultan himself escaped with difficulty, and only under cover of a disguise: he fled precipitately to Balk. Immense booty fell to the victors. Their army was soon increased by the accession of several governors of the Transoxian provinces. To avoid any unnecessary waste of either men or time in reducing the fortified places which continued to hold out, and to preserve his advantage over the humbled Sultan, Timur prevailed on Ali Sjir, a lieutenant of the former, who resided at Samarcand, to rebel: henceforth both were to hold joint sway over the provinces which acknowledged the delegated authority of Ali. Secure of the fidelity of his new ally. he hastened to besiege the Sultan, who, foreseeing the approaching storm, had prepared for a vigorous defence; but the victorious Timur took Balk in 771 (A.D. 1363). He showed elemency to the inhabitants, and honourably dismissed the princes who had served Hussein; but the unfortunate Sultan was led captive to Samarcand, and there put to death. With the power, he now assumed the title of Sultan, or Emperor; he constituted, as his vicar, Sabur Gatmesk, sprung from the imperial Genghis: he continued Ali in the government of Samarcand, but no longer as an equal.

The prosperous career of the conqueror raised him up a formidable opponent in Toctamish Khan. No sooner did the latter hear the melancholy fate of Hussein, his relative and neighbour, than, alarmed for the security of his own possessions, he assembled a mighty army, and marched against Timur. The two armies met on the banks of the Jaxartes, and a fierce conflict immediately commenced. Here "the wheel of war ceased not to turn until the forces of Timur were greatly diminished." With a despairing voice he called out to one of his chiefs: "Seid, my troops are giving way!" "Fear not," was the reply of the latter, who dismounted, gathered a handful of dust, re-ascended his horse, rode to meet the enemy, threw the dust in the faces of some advancing soldiers, and at the same time exclaimed, "Cursed be he who flees!" He was followed by Timur, who with a terrible voice called on his men to turn and face the foe. The example of the two warriors produced its intended effect on the soldiers of Timur, who made a sudden stand, and "Cursed be he who flees!" burst from every mouth. The scales of victory were immediately turned; after a great carnage Toctamish fled with the remnant of his troops, and left immense booty to the conqueror.

After this decisive action Timur was for some time occupied in quelling an insurrection, which during his absence had broken out in Samarcand. Having extinguished the flame, he turned his arms against Khorasan, a country which then contained many powerful governments. The metropolis is Korkan, a place which, though inhabited by heretics, abounds with delights, is the resort of the learned, and the abode of the elegant and refined. The natives of Khorasan equal those of Samarcand in cunning, whom they surpass in magnificence and refinement. They are much addicted to polite literature. and poetry in particular; they are truly admirable for their knowledge of the pleasing arts, especially of music, which is cultivated by people of all ranks, and from earliest infancy: hence the proverb, "that their children in the cradle cannot cry in any other than a musical tone." Timur marched twice into Khorasan, and on both occasions the Sultan was absent. In his first inroad he contented himself with laying waste the country adjoining the capital; but in the second he laid siege to the city. He was, however, prevailed upon to raise it, and to retire without committing any further depredations, in consideration of a vast sum of money. In the exaggerated language of Ahmed, we are told that at first he demanded as much silver as would load 200 horses; but he was at length induced to accept one-fourth of that quantity: " whereupon he restrained the devils of his army from plunder, and returned to Samarcand."

The next exploit of Timur shews that gratitude was not one of his ruling qualities. He went to Malik, the sultan of Hor (the son then reigned), who, as we have seen, had rescued him from an ignominious death, and he threatened to invade the territories of the latter unless he were instantly acknowledged as superior lord. The reply of Malik reminded him of the obligations he owed to one who had laboured so hard to save his life; and, after recapitulating the excesses he had committed in the territories of Hor, it concluded by saying, that if he did not exhibit a grateful heart, he would be undeserving the name of a man, he would be no better than a dog. This exhortation was of no avail; Timur marched against the Sultan, who was defeated and besieged in the capital. Seeing that all hope of defence was vain, the latter offered to surrender on the condition that both his life and that of his people should be saved. Timur accepted the condition; he swore that not a drop of blood should be shed,-that the Sultan's skin should be left whole. The city was accordingly surrendered, and the ferocious victor kept his oath by throwing the deposed monarch into prison, and leaving him there to perish with hunger and thirst.

Having ravaged the territory of Segestan, he aspired to the vast dominion of the deceased Sultan; but Khorasan would perhaps never have obeyed his sway had he not prevailed on Mohammed, the religious head of all who belonged to the sect of Ali, to espouse his cause. He confirmed the vicarial dignity of the latter over Khorasan, whose honours were multiplied, and whose riches were greatly increased. This example had all the effect it was intended to produce; it brought over all the governors of the country to the temporal dominion of Timur.

The same of the Tartar now began to spread over all Persia and Arabia.

To the king of the former country he despatched a brief letter, which, as it is characteristic of the writer, we give as literally as possible.

The Most High has made me lord over thee, and all unjust princes, over all kings, those tyrants of men. He has raised me above all my opponents, and, as thou well knowest, has assisted me against all who have risen to contend with me. If thou wilt submit, and thereby fulfil the Divine decree, thou wilt do well; if not, know that three terrible ministers precede me,—desolation, famine, and pestilence. The evil will be owing to thee alone, and its weight will fall on thine own head.

The Shah could do nothing but bend to the storm. He entered into an alliance with Timur; and to strengthen it the more, he gave his daughter to a son of the latter. He is praised by Ahmed for his learning, his attachment to literature, especially poetry, and above all for the orthodox manner in which he explained the Kenjaf, an esteemed commentary on the Koran. During his life Timur never visited Persia; but the Shah's death, and the domestic troubles of the kingdom, afforded the Tartar a fair opportunity to render it subject to his nower. Shah Mansor, the reigning king, endeavoured to strengthen himself by alliances with his neighbours, the other princes of Persia; but as they had long been his enemies, the sense of the common danger could not prevail on them to unite with him for the common defence; he was therefore left to struggle alone against the approaching inundation. His means were very inadequate to the greatness of the contest. Though he laid claim to the whole of Persia from the Oxus to the Tigris, his authority was acknowledged only by Fars, in Persia Proper, a district the least populous and important of all the rest. His efforts were, however, prodigious. He had resolved to leave the fortified city of Shiraz in the care of his chiefs, with the best part of his little army; while with a chosen band he hovered about the enemy, to annov them as much as possible, and to cut in pieces any of the straggling parties he might meet. As, in accordance with this purpose, he was passing through the gate, he was perceived by an old woman, who, conceiving that he was seeking his own safety, and abandoning the inhabitants to their fate, raised her voice to curse him: " see the son of a harlot! having consumed all we had, and been so long a tyrant over us, he leaves us at our utmost need to be destroved by the enemy. God curse both him and his arms, and may he never prosper more!" This aroused his indignation, not so much against the poor creature who had uttered it, as against the Tartars. He so far changed his purpose as to assemble his troops, and lead them against the advancing hosts of Timur. He swore that he would never quit his followers, never lay down his arms night or day, never cease to harass the proud foe, "until heaven gave the victory to one of the parties." Though he was described on the field by one of his best supporters, a chief who commanded a considerable portion of his little army, and was in consequence left with scarcely a thousand horse, he maintained his ground until darkness separated the combatants. But that season could afford no rest to the Shah. Here Alimed favours us with a narrative of exploits as exaggerated as those ascribed to the famous Spanish Cid, Ruy Diaz de Bivar. At the head of his few followers, Mansor stole to the hostile camp, and in the confusion which followed his unexpected attack he slew 10,000 of the Tartars. Not even when morning appeared, and discovered his handful of men, did he desist from the fight. He was present in every place, exclaiming, "I am Shah Mansor!" All whom he attacked fled, "like wild asses before the lion." He sought the tent of Timur, who was concealed under the garments of the women. On his entrance, some of them pointing to a squadron of Tartars who still kept their ground, said: "Timur is among those soldiers: there thou mayest seek him," Unsuspicious of deceit, he turned round, and spurred his fiery steed among the enemy: he dealt death around him; but at length all his followers save two were either killed or "What could he do against a multitude? His wing was clipped, his strength spent; he was oppressed by the loss of blood; his war-cry grew feeble: his vociferations ceased; he was fainting also with thirst, and panting for breath amidst the clouds of dust." One of his two companions fell: the other, after receiving seventy wounds, contrived to escape! Unable any longer to contend, he threw himself among the heaps of dead. soldiers, seeing no enemy to oppose them, went to their chief, whom they found almost frightened to death. For a long time he would not leave his hiding place; he feared that the king still lived, and was lying in wait for an opportunity to despatch him. To ascertain whether the latter "was really translated to the house of death," he caused strict search to be made for the body. One of his soldiers discovered the wounded king, who seeing the man approach, said: "I am the Shah. Take these jewels, and conceal my present state from every one: say not that thou hast seen me. And if thou wilt convev me to my brothers and friends, I shall probably be restored to strength; and instead of the reward thou wouldst receive for taking me, thou shalt enjoy my friendship." The fellow took the jewels, but preferring present advantage to the uncertainty of future gain, he was base enough to cut off the head, and carry it to Timur. But his cruelty availed him little: he was put to death by his chief for taking away the life after receiving the presents of Timur being thus freed from his formidable foe, had little difficulty in compelling the princes of Persia to acknowledge his power. He entered Ispahan, and dreadful were the ravages which, according to our historian, he perpetrated in that city and its vicinity. "He made human blood run in torrents; committed sacrilege; seized on every thing valuable; laid waste the labours of the husbandman; burned whole fields of corn; cut off the breasts of mothers, and dashed their infants on the ground."-" He pitied not the aged for their years, nor the "child for its tender infancy: he honoured not the learned for their erudition, the men of letters for their fame, the noble for their descent, the high for their dignity, the pilgrims for their long wanderings; he spared not his neighbours for their proximity, the true believers for their orthodoxy, the dependent for their devotion to their superiors, the feeble for their helplessness, nor the foolish for their lack of understanding: in short, he had no meroy upon any one." And the inhabitants, knowing that the decrees of fate must be fulfilled, and that resistance would be equally vain and impious, appear to have quietly submitted " in the hour of slaughter."-" The wind of destruction ceased not to blow them from the tree of life until the number of those who fell was six times greater than that of ancient Nineveli."

those

Having collected immense booty in the conquered provinces of Persia, from Courdistan to the Oxus, he slowly returned to Samarcand. But his active mind could ill bear the slumber of repose: he soon placed himself at the head of his squadrons, defeated the Getes and Moguls, and fortified his distant frontiers against all irruptions from the regions beyond the Jaxartes. "The viper" then returned with his troops into Khorasan; "humbled the high, raised the low;" and again marched with his countless hosts into Persian to quell some disturbances which his absence had occasioned.

In a succeeding number we intend to cast a rapid glasce on the remainder of Timur's campaigns, from the Ganges to the Hellespont.

1829.]

ANALYSIS OF THE CODE OF MENU.

(Continued from p. 166.)

THE fifth chapter of this code, which is devoted to the subjects of "Diet, Purification, and Women," opens with a question from the great Rishis, or sages, to the high-minded Bhrigu: "how, Lord, can death prevail over Brahmens, who know the scriptural ordinances, and perform their duties as they have been declared?" The son of Menu proceeds thereupon to describe the sins which produce "the inclination of death" to the twice-born. These sins are many of them remarkable: a neglect of reading the Véda, and a desertion of approved usages, stand first on the list; then follow offences in diet, such as eating of garlic, onions, lecks, mushrooms, and all vegetables raised in dung, as well as of gums and resins, rice-pudding boiled with tila, the milk of any quadruped with a hoof not cloven, any thing naturally sweet but acidulated, certain kinds of birds, and quadrupeds with uncloven hoofs; "he who eats the flesh of any animal is called the eater of that animal itself; and a fisheater is an eater of all flesh; from fish, therefore, he must diligently abstain." The most pernicious of the prohibited articles are mushrooms, the flesh of a tame hog or a town cock, leeks, onions, and garlick. A twice-born man intentionally eating any one of these six articles is degraded immediately; if he undesignedly tastes of one, he must perform the penance of an anchorite, called Santapana (which we shall subsequently find to be most severe and disgusting); for other things he must fast a whole day.

It is a vulgar error to suppose that Brahmens are wholly interdicted from eating flesh under any circumstances: this part of the code contains a distinct permission to eat flesh meat, on the condition that it shall have been previously offered for sacrifice. Nay, it is expressly declared, that the man who, in such circumstances, refuses to cat it, shall sink in another world, for twenty-one births, to the state of a brute. "Beasts and birds of excellent sorts," says the text, "may be slain by Bráhmens for sacrifice, or for the sustenance of those whom they are bound to support, since Agastya did this of old. No doubt in the primeval sacrifices by holy men, and in oblations by those of the priestly and military tribes, the flesh of such beasts and birds as may be legally eaten was presented to the deities." Again: "for the sustenance of the vital spirit, Brahmá created all this (animal and vegetable system); and all that is moveable or immoveable that spirit devours." Again: "he who eats (accordug to law, a parenthesis interpolated by Culluca Bhatta), commits no sin even though every day he tastes the flesh of such animals as may lawfully be tasted; since both animals who may be eaten, and those who cat them, were equally created by Brahma." Again: "No sin is committed by him, who, having honoured the deities and the manes, cats flesh meat which he has bought, or which he has himself acquired, or which has been given him by another." The unnecessary slaughter of animals is, indeed, carefully provided against: the slayer of a beast "in vain," which the commentator defines as "not offered for sacrifice," is sentenced to undergo as many similar deaths in the next world, from birth to birth, as there are hairs on the beast. A singular example of the pucrilities which occasionally disfigure this code appears in the following provision: "should be (a Bráhmen) have an earnest desire to taste flesh meat, he may gratify his fancy by forming the image of some beast with clarified ter thickened; or he may form it with dough." This would be a substitute for flesh meat as little satisfactory to the appose as the crust of Lord Peter.

Some apparent inconsistency prevails in this part of the code, in respect to the eating of flesh: the precepts before quoted clearly recognize the right of man to slay animals for the support of life, and the duty of eating their flesh, in certain circumstances; yet the following verses would lead to a conclusion totally opposite:

He who injures no animated creature shall attain without hardship whatever he thinks of, whatever he strives for, whatever he fixes his mind on.

Flesh meat cannot be procured without injury to animals, and the slaughter of animals obstructs the path to beatitude; from flesh meat, therefore, let man abstain.

Attentively considering the formation of bodies, and the death or confinement of embodied spirits, let him abstain from eating flesh meat of any kind.

He who consents to the death of an animal, he who kills it, he who dissects it, he who buys it, he who sells it, he who dresses it, he who serves it up, and he who makes it his food, these are eight principals in slaughter.

The man who performs annually, for a hundred years, an aswamedha,* and the man who abstains from flesh meat, enjoy for their virtue an equal reward.

"Me he (mán sa) will devour in the next world whose flesh I eat in this life:" thus the learned pronounce the derivation of the word mánsa, or flesh.

These injunctions are succeeded by a declaration, that in lawfully tasting meat there is no turpitude, though abstinence is a virtue. The context shews that, provided the animal be sacrificed to the gods, to the manes, or for a solemn offering to guests, flesh meat may be eaten; or when in urgent distress, or in danger of losing life. The slayer of cattle, on the three first-named occasions, is not merely justified, but he "conveys both himself and those cattle to the summit of beatitude." Even gramineous plants, timber trees, amphibious animals and birds, destroyed for the purpose of sacrifice, "attain in the next world exalted births!"

The next department of the code relates to purification: and here, also, we encounter a series of rules which, to us at least, cannot but appear extremely frivolous and absurd. Impurity is occasioned by the birth or death of a child, which is removed from his kindred in one or three nights, according as the child's head has or has not been shorn when alive; the death of a kinsman causes impurity to his relations, which is removable by certain rules depending on the place of his death, whether near or distant. A pupil becomes impure if his spiritual teacher die, or the teacher's son or wife. On the death of a military king, in whose dominion he lives, a Bráhmen is impure. If he touches a Chandála (a degraded caste), an outcast, a new-born child, a corpse, or one who has touched a corpse, he is impure till he bathes. "Should a Bráhmen touch a human bone moist with oil, he is purified by bathing; if it be not oily, by stroking a cow, or by looking at the sun, having sprinkled his mouth duly with water."

Under certain circumstances, the individual is defended from impurity by the employment in which he is engaged. Kings and students in theology, whilst performing their respective duties, no impurity can taint: "to a king on the throne of magnanimity the law ascribes instant purification, because his throne was raised for the protection of his people and the supply of their nourishment." The same privilege attaches to those who die in battle, after the king has been slain, or have been killed by lightning, or legally by the king himself, "or in defence of a cow or of a priest."

The great purifiers of the various beings and objects are the following: sacred learning, austere devotion, pious meditaten, liberality, forgiveness of injuries, injuries, fire, holy aliment, earth, the mind (which is itself purified by truth), water, cow-dung, air, prescribed acts of religion, the sun, time, ashes, acids, cusa-grass, &c. Wooden vessels are purified by planing them; sacrificial pots are purified by rubbing with the hand and washing at the time of sacrifice. Leathern utensils, those of cane, and cloth, are purified by sprinkling with hallowed water; grain, green vegetables, roots, and fruit, by washing; a house is purified by rubbing, brushing, and smearing with cow-dung; land, by cow-dung or cow's urine, or by letting a cow pass a day and night upon it, "A thing nibbled by a bird, smelt at by a cow, shaken with a foot, sneezed on, or defiled by lice, is purified by earth scattered over it." A cow going to quench her thirst in water renders it pure; every vendible commodity by being exposed to sale becomes pure; the hand of an artist is always pure; the mouth of a woman is constantly pure; as is also a dog, on his catching the deer; the flesh of a wild beast killed by dogs; likewise gnats, clear drops from the mouth of a speaker, a shadow, a cow, a horse, sun-beams, dust, carth, air, and fire. Ex his disce omnes.

Sacrifice of a horse with certain ceremonies; one of the most solemn and most meritorious rites of the Hindu faith.

The next subject treated of is women. It commences with the following verses:

By a girl, or by a young woman, or by a woman advanced in years, nothing must be done, even in her own dwelling place, according to her mere pleasure:

In childhood must a female be dependent on her father: in youth on her husband; her lord being dead, on her sons: a woman must never seek independence.

Him to whom her father has given her, or her brother with the paternal assent, let her obsequiously honour, while he lives; and when he dies let her never neglect him.

Though unobservant of approved usages, or enamoured of another woman, or devoid of good qualities; yet a husband must constantly be revered as a god by a virtuous wife. A faithful wife, who wishes to attain in heaven the mansion of her husband, must do

A rathful wife, who wishes to attain in heaven the mansor of the massache, mass according unkind to him, be he living or dead:

Let her emaciate her body, by living voluntarily on pure flowers, roots, and fruit;

but let her not, when her lord is deceased, even pronounce the name of another man.

Let her continue till death forgiving all injuries, performing harsh duties, avoiding every sensual pleasure, and cheerfully practising the incomparable rules of virtue which have been followed by such women as were devoted to one only husband.

But a widow, who, from a wish to bear children, slights her deceased husband (by marrying again), brings disgrace on herself here below, and shall be excluded from the seat of her lord.

We here perceive no traces of the Satí rite, to which not the most distant allusion is made throughout the code. We are, therefore, warranted in assuming that the practice, from whatever cause it originated, was introduced into the institutions of the Hindus at a period posterior in date to the Code of Menu. Hence it is argued by some, that the practice is necessarily illegal, according to the principles of the Hindus themselves, who attribute this saying to the sege Vrihaspeti, that "no code was approved which contradicted Menu." On the other hand, it is alleged, that other works, though not of equal antiquity or authority with this code, recommend the practice; and though not enjoined specifically by Menu, it is not repugnant to any of his precepts. Moreover, it is laid down in the first chapter of the code, that "immemorial custom is transcendant law."

The concluding vers. of this chapter contain encomia upon the wife who shall in no respect fail in duty towards her husband; and a permission to a twice-born man, after burning with hellowed fire and fit implements of sacrifice, his wife dying before him, to take another, and "again light the nuptial fire."

THE USE OF TEA.

To the Editor of the Asiatic Journal.

Sin: I am an old reader of the Asiatic Journal, and I think I recollect in one of its early numbers a complaint from a correspondent that that grateful, exhibitanting and salubrious beverage, tea, was beginning to be despised amongst the aristocratical portion of our fellow countrymen, and bid fair to subside into a source of enjoyment for the vulgar. I am sorry to say that I fear there is too much reason for this complaint at present, and that there is gaining ground in this country a contempt for the matchless Chinese herb, to which I observe that Dr. Ainslie (in his excellent Materia Indica) attributes the brilliancy of imagination and fineness of fancy which so peculiarly distinguish the poets of our country; though I apprehend Shakespeare, Milton, cum multis aliis, borrowed no part of their inspiration from tea. He grounds his praise of this herb upon a remark of the Chevalier Roques, who says, "pris avec modération, il réveille l'esprit, lui donne un agitation douce, et plus d'un écrivain lui a dû un trait piquant, une pensée heureuse."

Whether tea has really the effect of stirring up poetic fires, and producing "thick-coming fancies," must be left, by me at least, an undecided question; but I should be sorry if the caprices of fashion should doom to neglect this wholesome beverage, because I fear none could be substituted in its place that would not occasion us to be losers in a variety of ways. Tea is certainly a promoter of health; it is, moreover, a promoter of sobriety; and above all, it promotes our navigation, our trade, our revenue: we could ill spare the sum which tea brings annually into our treasury.

Late dinner hours, French fashions, a taste for the coffee-berry, co-operate with caprice in gradually detaching the higher classes in this country from the use of tea; and I regret to say that where it maintains its ground, the reputation of the herb is in serious danger of being undermined, by the negligence with which the process of the infusion is managed. Either this is the fact, or in my circle of acquaintance there is a secret conspiracy against tea, which induces the makers of it to use vile sophistications, or so small a quantity of the genuine article, that verily the fluid offered for tea is little better than adulterated water.

The prevailing errors in the conduct of the infusion are, first, the use of too small a quantity of the leaf in proportion to the water; secondly, the using water not in a state of cbullition; thirdly, suffering the infusion to stand too long before it is drunk; and fourthly, suffering it to remain too short a time. The water should be poured in a boiling state upon the leaves; they should then remain infusing for three minutes,—no longer, or the leaf parts with its resin; and lastly, when more of the liquor is wanted, the old leaves should always be replaced by fresh ones.

Do not, sir, reject this vindication of an herb, the virtues of which have been celebrated by an imperial pen.

Yours, &c.

GAE CHA.

THEISM IN THE EAST.*

Or the three books composing M. Constant's third volume, "On Religion," which is devoted to the examination of Polytheism, two relate to Homeric theogony.

In his observations upon the progress of this doctrine, or rather the popular creeds of the ancient Greeks, the author discovers therein a confirmation of his hypothesis on the successive forms of religion. He distinguishes two epochs for the poems attributed to Homer. The Iliad and the Odyssey thus appertaining no longer to the same generation, we shall have, by a sort of mythological necessity, two Homers, as we have two Thoths, two Zerdushts, many Buddhas, and several Vyasas.

These learned commentaries upon the Homeric polytheism appear calculated to corroborate the opinion of the author regarding the genuine religious sentiment. Is it, however, certain that polytheism or idolatry has constituted the worship of nations? After having examined puerile Fetishism, degenerate Sabæism, Pantheism, allegories, and mythology, is there nothing more to be known of importance on the subject, particularly in the East, so prolific in religious symbols?

It is from the fundamental notions in the sacred books of a people that we fearn what their religion was, and what it ought still to be, amongst those individuals who are unsubdued by popular customs. When the multitude is enslaved, they often are in a measure ignorant of their religion. Surrendered to the interested lessons of priests, the vulgar accommodate themselves to the most ridiculous modes of adoration; and neglecting from age to age the principle of all sublimity, they fall at last prostrate before the foulest idols. But when a traveller meets with some poor wretches, in a village of the Alps or the Caucasus, wallowing with pigs in the midst of filth, is he thence to infer that the whole nation finds enjoyment in mud, and that from the earliest times they had no other abodes than pig-styes?

In a question so complicated as this, let us endeavour, the better to divest it of its difficulties, to form an idea of what ought to be the fact. Without producing in us a systematic prejudice, this datum will guide us in the midst of so many confused statements or irreconcileable interpretations.

The Zend books, the Vedas, the King, are now somewhat known, and it is not always very difficult to detect their meaning. M. Constant quotes them occasionally; but, however skilful he is in deducing just consequences from facts, we differ from him in the general result. We perceive in polytheism a degeneracy, an abuse, from which it was not thought politic perhaps to preserve the vulgar; and not a form, which, in any age of the world was ever expressly adopted by a large portion of the human race.

When theism remained nearly unknown to the multitude, when the notion became almost exclusively confined to the initiated, because in a country where the people could not read it was impracticable to strive against ignorance; when this acknowledgment appears in sacred books, M. Constant constructs the religion of these people of polytheism: he considers, moreover, the number of the persons, and this is a plausible mode of viewing the subject. On the contrary, disregarding the multitude, who have terrors and superstitions, but no real doctrine, we regard as the religion of a country the worship of that

From a French review of the third volume of M. B. Constant's work entitled " Do la Religion Conducts dans sa Source, ses Formes, et ses Développemens."

MARCH. class which give some account of their faith. The creed of the Chinese, for example, is in our opinion that of the permanent body of the literati, and not that of the mob, who follow implicitly the tracks of the Ho-shangs,* and always prefer the most silly or the most covetous of them. Hence polytheism annears to us to have prevailed in few countries as the general religion, notwithstanding it has extended itself widely as a popular superstition. It is not time, but the more general use of writing, that has evidently substituted theism for polytheism, or anthropomorphism for Fetishism. The secret doc. trine becomes insensibly that of the vulgar: without a small degree of instruction polytheism would be perpetuated; hitherto, on the contrary, in spite of the ignorance of the multitude, theism has been still preserved with more or less purity.

The Hindu reformer, Ram Mohun Roy, taxes his contemporaries with poly. theism, asserting that idols are no longer in their eyes mere emblems, and that they believe in the positive existence of their gods and goddesses. But what are we to infer from thence against the ancient and even actual theism of a part of the Hindus? Does not Ram Mohun Roy himself declare, that many Brahmins regard with indignation the erroneous notions of their countrymen. so foreign to the true doctrine of the ancient sacred books? He labours to recall the multitude to the primitive idea of the invisible divinity. Mahomet did the same, when he overthrew the statues with which the holy Caaba was surrounded, and thus addressed his partizans: "The word of God is old: it is idolatry which is new; Islam was the creed of Abraham and the prophets," It was by recalling the Hindus to the ancient text of their sacred books that Ram Mohun Roy converted several Hindu families of Calcutta to monotheism, as may be seen in the fourteenth volume of the Asiatic Researches.

In the Bhagavat Geeta the great god is sole and distinct from all perishable beings. In the Upanishads, the soul, emanating from the Eternal God, who is the beginning, the middle, and the end of things, approaches to its principle by sobriety, humility, temperance, and by internally pronouncing the ineffable word om, that is, by uniting itself in thought to the divine creatorpreserver-changer. According to the Yajur Veda, the self-existent being has regulated the existence of each creature, and all which exists is enveloped, as it were, by this supreme mind. After death, the soul which desires to know this eternal mind will be united to it for ever. Here we behold morality attached to religion from the earliest semi-historical times. Without affirming, with a learned German, that the primitive religion of the Hindus was eminently intellectual and abstracted, we recognize in it at least the religious sentiment. We perceive it likewise amongst the Persians. We cannot determine the precise point of time when it prevailed amongst the Chinese; that it is of great antiquity is apparent from what we possess of the She-King, and the vague comments of the E-King.

Amongst a people for a long period divided into castes, like the Hindus, and very irregularly cultivated, contradictory opinions or errors may prevail at the same moment. Polytheism still subsists on the Ganges, notwithstanding the number of centuries which have elapsed since a renowned innovator holdly promulgated there, before he died, the notion entertained by many ancient sages of Hindustan, that the world is illusory. The elevated doctrine of theism has never been unknown in civilized countries; it has remained veiled during ages of servitude, but soon propagated itself again amongst all classes. At the present present day, the independent tribes of Sikhs celebrate publicly in their hymns the unity of the supreme power.

Notwithstanding a species of apparent immutability justly attributed to the nations of the East, this part of the world has undergone numerous changes, and we cannot know it as we know Greece, which rose upon the decay of Egypt. The western vallies of the Nile, and all the south of Asia, as far as the mouths of the Wang, composed the ancient world; but it is in a great measure closed against our researches. Our notions respecting ancient Asia, even since the historical time, continue to be, in many respects, conjectural.

The author remarks, with apparent justice, in the Veda in particular, a jumble of theism and pantheism. Would not a stranger regard as a striking trait of pantheism that principle of Malebranche, that we see all things in God? The religious sentiment may always exist in full force where there is found the dogma of the divine unity. As soon as the deity governs, moral consequences are nearly the same, whether we proclaim him independent of perishable things, or whether we combine together in him whatever was, whatever will be, and whatever may exist or appear to exist.

If the religious sentiment is natural, it should manifest itself constantly, but diversely, and according to the extent of our ideas. These differences in the faculties of the mind are not less considerable between man and man, than between people and people. The noblest, and at the same time the most moral creeds, may therefore be as aucient as the human race in those countries where civilization began. Under the Homeric form, says the author, man left to himself, deduced from his own reflection the motives of actions which regarded other men. Such must have been in Greece the slaves, and even many of the citizens: but, besides that in this great question, to bestow so much attention upon a narrow peninsula, which had no religion properly so called, is to desert the rule for the exception; the initiated, at least, have admitted, since the Orphic age, that divine protection was merited by justice towards man. In respect to the East, there is reason to believe that towards the Nile, as well as towards the Ganges, those religious books more ancient than the time of Abraham, which are cited in the Sepher, were not unknown. Writing being little employed amongst the ancients, it was extremely difficult to prevent the popular religion becoming puerile or absurd, whilst other traditions remained deposited in the sanctuary. Several poets, before Lucretius, had consured polytheism, which was not shaken thereby. Ten centuries before it ccased amongst the Hellenists, the Epoptes were accustomed to contemn it. Idols, the worship of which cannot but be prejudicial to morals, still have numerous votaries in China; nevertheless, a hundred successive generations have read in the She-king, called "the Voice of Antiquity," that " Heaven punishes injustice; the good which it bestows upon mankind depends upon virtue."

In enumerating those harsh, and even impious opinions, attributed to certain sacerdotal castes, or more probably sects, of ancient Asia, the author observes that the religious sentiment, so powerful in minds suffered to enjoy freedom, may be altogether extinguished amongst sacerdotal bodies by the sacrilegious scheme of making religion an instrument. This remark is extremely sound: secular views degrade the mind, which would otherwise apply itself to the study of divine things. But we add, that the first effect of independence of mind ought to be to excite doubt as to every thing invisible, at the risk of inclining towards materialism. From this error escape is speedy: we soon find it possible to explain the world without recourse to matter, but not without intelligence. If a revolution be not then admitted, we may halt in a state of uncertainty betwist theism and a species of pantheism. It is thus, according to the observation of a celebrated English writer, that, though with less speed, a man becomes again religious: the sentiment of celestial things was not extinct, but opposed. The sacerdotal castes, as well as individuals, have followed this course. Without prejudices, but without depth, we should be unbelieving. With a larger degree of penetration, and considerations of a higher order, we discover beyond every thing the secret action of the Divine Power. It will be manifest in every age by the force of reason, in the infancy of mind; but in all ages weak uncultivated reason will be prone to superstition.

Even prior to the art of writing, the effect of speech, that potent faculty, enlightened some individuals whose disciples became the legislators of certain tribes. Perhaps it is for this reason that there is not a single religious or moral opinion, some ancient trace of which we ought not to discover. In an eastern country, where slavery is not yet abolished, slavery has for thirty centuries been censured. The art of printing has propagated, but it did not generate, the principle of brotherly affection amongst the children of the same country, or that of primordial equality amongst mankind. Countries have differed more than ages: the understanding of men, as well their physiognomy, has varied incessantly. A different proportion begins to obtain, by means of books, between the instructed and the ignorant classes. Of all human movements, this will be the most rapid; but in condemning intolerable abuses, true religion will not be weakened: what is pure will subsist, whilst that which is of man will perish.

SIR THOMAS MUNRO.

In our memoir of the late Sir Thomas Munro (p. 154), we stated our belief that that lamented individual left no issue, and that consequently the baronetey was extinct. This we find to be incorrect. He left two sons. The eldest, now Sir Thomas Munro, is about nine years of age; the youngest, Campbell Munro, is in his fifth year.

At the commencement of the memoir we stated, on the authority of a personal friend of the late Baronet, that "his birth was rather obscure." We have, however, the best authority for contradicting this statement. Sir Thomas was the second son of a respectable merchant in Glasgow, who was engaged in the extensive commerce carried on by that city with Virginia and the other American colonies, prior to their separation from the parent country; his family moved in the first society, and were related to some of the oldest and most respectable families in Scotland.

Review of Books.

The East-India Gazetteer, by Walter Hamilton. London. 2 vols. 8vo. 1828. 2d Edition.

To pass a judgment upon a work which has already been stamped with public approbation, is an undertaking of no great difficulty, unless the reviewer be disposed to call in question the opinion of the world. As this is very far from our design or inclination, in introducing to the notice of our readers a new edition of Mr. Hamilton's excellent compilation (which will not be published till next month), we shall do little more than advert to its improvements and additions, confident that the reputation which the work already enjoys renders it superfluous for us to do more in the way of recommendation.

It is needless to point out the absolute necessity of a work like this in Europe. We are not aware that there is, in fact, any other publication whatever which affords European readers a guide to the general geography of the East. It is impossible to place any reliance upon the usual books of reference in geographical questions relating to India; they are not only defective, but extremely inaccurate.

The copious and valuable accessions to our stock of geographical knowledge respecting eastern countries which have accrued since the first appearance of the Gazetteer, from a variety of causes (chiefly the great political events which have enlarged the British empire in the East, and the persevering efforts of individual enterprize), have furnished Mr. Hamilton with materials for the improvement of his work, of which, it is but just to say, he sems to have availed himself with his characteristic diligence. The information now contained in the Gazetteer will be of the highest utility to every class of English readers, including the Government and members of the Legislature; the facts have been accumulated with great labour from a multitude of authentic sources, and, as far as we are able to speak (for we have seen but a portion of the work), may be safely resorted to as a work of authority.

As specimens of the additions, we insert a statement of the British acquisitions in Ultra-Gangetic India:

1st. The countries south of Rangoon ceded to the British Government consist of half the province of Martaban, the provinces of Tavoy, Ye, Tenasserim, and the Mergui isles.

Length along the Bay of Bengal 420 miles, average breadth about 50 miles, giving a total area (excluding the Mergui isles) of 21,000 square miles. Total population about 51,000 persons, or rather less than 2½ individuals to the square mile. Revenue expected in 1827, about four lacs of rupees.

2d. The province of Arracan and its dependencies. Length 220 miles along the seacoast; average breadth rather more than 50, giving an area of about 11,000 square miles. Population estimated at 100,000, or about nine to the square mile. Revenue expected in 1827, about three lacs of rupees.

Abstract of British Acquisitions.

|                               | Area.  |              |         | Population. |
|-------------------------------|--------|--------------|---------|-------------|
| Provinces south of Rangoon    | 21,000 | square miles | 3       | . 51,000    |
| Province of Arracan           | 11,000 | do.          |         | .100,000    |
|                               |        |              |         |             |
| Total of British acquisitions | 32,000 |              | Persons | 151,000     |

Exclusive of the Mergui isles which are not inhabited.

The countries from which the Burmese have been expelled, and to which the King of Ava by treaty renounces all claim, consist of Assam and the adjacent petty states south of the Brahmaputra river, occupying a space (by estimate) of about 40,000 square miles, with a population of probably not more than two or three persons to the square mile.

The eastern extremity of Assam, now virtually under British protection, appears to border on Chinese Tibet, and to reach within 200 miles of the province of Yunan in China.

The following is a more detailed statement of the British conquests south of Rangoon:

The British conquests south of Rangoon consist of the following provinces, viz.

Martaban, Ye, Tavoy, Tenasserim* (or Mergui), and the Mergui Archipelago; containing the town of Martaban (restored), Amberst, Ye, Tavoy, and Mergui.

The northern boundary of this territory is in lat. 16° 30' N., from whence it extends nearly in a north and south direction to lat. 10° 35' N.; the southern boundary being about 430 miles distant by sea from Prince of Wales' Island. The intervening country belongs to Siam. It is difficult to determine the superficial extent of this tract, no accurate map of the whole having as yet been published, but it may be roughly estimated at 420 miles in length by 50 in breadth, giving a total area of 21,000 square miles, exclusive of the Mergui Archipelago.†

| Total population of Martaban, according to Lieut. Low  Deduct the proportion restored, say |  |
|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|--|
| Total population of British Martaban Population of Tavoy, Ye, and Tenasserim               |  |

Total population of the British conquests south of Rangoon in 1825, 51,000; or rather less than 2\frac{1}{2} persons to the square mile.

These provinces form a strong military position against the Burmese and Siamese, but they bring us into direct contact with both these governments. When first visited by European voyagers they were partly subject to Pegu, then a flourishing kingdom, and partly to Siam; but subsequent to A.D. 1760 the whole were conquered by the Burmese, from which date foreign trade was annihilated, and the inhabitants during the Burmese and Siamese wars almost exterminated or carried into slavery. At present they are under the supervision of the Penang government, to which they will probably be permanently annexed.

We add an account of the isthmus of Kraw.

This isthmus connects the Malay peninsula with the continent of Asia, and in the narrowest part does not exceed ninety-seven miles from sea to sea. Its name appears to have been taken from Kraw, said to be a small inland village between Chaiya and Choomphoon.

The route from Mergui to Choomphoon, on the gulf of Siam, lies along the sea-coast as far as the mouth of the river Pakchan, which falls into the bay of Bengal, then up that river to the Siamese post of Pakchan, about the centre of the isthmus, and then by land to Choomphoon. The exact position of the Pakchan river has not yet been ascertained, but its mouth is probably somewhere about lat. 11° 5′ N., about eighly miles south of Mergui; the whole of which intervening coast is said to be a labyrinth of creeks and channels. Many native travellers declare that it is quite practicable to make a navigable canal across the isthmus of Kraw by joining the Pakchan and Choomphoon rivers. The first is said to be a considerable river, broad and deep throughout: the Choomphoon has a very winding course, with a sandy bed. Both rivers are said to Tenasserim is the name of the province, Mergui that of the modern capital, old Tenasserim, the ancient capital, having been destroyed by the Siamese.

† Mr. Maingy, the acting commissioner, estimates the provinces of Tavoy, including Ye (which is a mere district) and Tenasserim, at 39,000 square miles, Mr. Crawfurd at only 12,900, and Lieut. Low at 15,000, which last is probably much nearest the real extent. Of the Martaban province, estimated by Lieut. Low at 12,000 square miles, the British have only retained about one-half.

be free from rocks, or any intervening hilly ground; in fact, according to native accounts, they already sometimes unite during high spring tides. Up to the post of Pakchan occupies two flowing tides in boats, the rest of the journey is usually pursued by travellers on foot. In 1826 a Siamese guard of sixty persons were stationed at Pakchan village, and relieved monthly from Choomphoon.

The state of our relations with the Raja of Colapoor at present, will render the following account of it interesting; this extract will likewise better shew the succinct and judicious style of Mr. Hamilton's narration.

Colapoor (Calapur).—A small independent Maharatta state in the province of Bejapoor, the territories of which are partly situated below the western ghaut mountains in the Concan, and partly in the clevated land within the ghauts; but all so intermingled with the possessions of other Maharatta chiefs and with those of the British government, that it is quite impossible to discriminate them. Until 1812 the Colapoor chief possessed Mahwan and three other fortresses on the sea-coast, which were then ceded to the British government. At present the chief towns within this principality are Colapoor (the capital), Parnellah, Mulcapoor, and Culgong.

The Colapoor family trace their descent from Sevajee, the founder of the Maharatta empire. According to their traditions Sevajee had two sons, Sambha and Rama; the first of these had also two sons, Sahoo and Sambha. Sahoo died without issue; Sambha adopted a son, from whom the Colapoor raja is descended, who being thus hneal heir of Sevajee in the elder branch, took precedence of the Peshwa, and was addressed by the latter as his superior. Sewai Chutter Putter (the reigning raja in 1803) gained a great deal of country by usurpation and conquest, during the confusion in the Peshwa's dominions after the death of Madhoorow, particularly from his neighbours the Putwurden family, although he was only at war with one branch of it (Appah Saheb); but among the Maharattas such aggressions are not thought incompatible with the accustomed relations of peace and amity.

During Purseram Bhow's imprisonment, the Colapoor raja seized the opportunity to lavage the possessions of his family (the Putwurdens), and actually plundered some of their principal towns, such as Savanore, Hubely, and Jasgone. The latter was the Bhow's capital, where he had expended a large sum in erecting a palace, which the raja burned to the ground and demolished forthwith. When liberated, the old Bhow carried on a war for some time against the raja; but being defeated and taken prisoner in 1799, was, although a Brahmin, cut to pieces in the presence of his enemy. His son, Appah Saheb, then took the command of the troops, animated by the most implacable hatred towards the Colapsor chief, declaring he would never forgive or forget such an act of atrocity, and expressing his willingness to sacrifice all that he had in the world, and retire a naked mendicant to Benares, if he could only adequately revenge the slaughter of his father. But this satisfaction he was not destined to enjoy, for just when, with the assistance of Dowlet Row Sindia's regular infantry, he had reduced the fortress of Colapoor to the last extremity, and was on the eve of accomplishing his wishes, Sindia, by a secret agreement with his enemy, withdrew his troops; and Appali Saheb, unable to prosecute the siege with his own troops and resources, was compelled to retreat. In 1803 a cessation of hostilities was effected by the Duke of Wellington, then General Wellesley.

In 1804, in consequence of the repeated piracies committed by the Raja of Colapoor's subjects, his ports were blockaded, and payment demanded of money due to the Company and to the British merchants at Bombay. During the time of war, the cruizer stationed on the coast was never of sufficient strength to fight one of the enemy's privaters, on which account, to avoid the disgraceful event of her capture, General Wellesley recommended a treaty to be entered into with the raja, which, if he afterwards broke, it would afford ample grounds to the British government to get effectually rid of an evil, which, in the existing state of its power, was derogatory to its dignity.

About this period, also, Viswas Row Ghautky and Serjee Row Ghautky, two favourites of Sindia, and most persevering depredators, took refuge with the Colapoor raja, after their own banditti had been defeated and dispersed by General Wellesley.

The general in consequence addressed a letter in 1804 to the raja, informing him that he was perfectly aware of the family connexion between him and these brothers, and that it was not the custom of the British government, nor his own wish, to perpetuate enmities, or to deprive those of an asylum who were inclined to live in peace, for which reason he did not call on the raja to deliver up the two Ghautkies, as he might be justified in doing. At the same time he notified to the raja, that as he had given them an asylum, the British government would consider him responsible for their conduct: and, that if they again assembled troops, which could only be intended to disturb the peace of other powers, he (the raja) would be called upon to answer for the injuries they might do, of which circumstance that letter was a friendly notification. The duke added: "it is time that the nations of India should enjoy some peace, and you may depend upon it that the British government will not suffer it to be wantonly disturbed with impunity."

From the above date the state of Colapoor enjoyed comparative tranquillity, and in 1812 was again rescued from intestine disorders by the interference of the British government. In 1820 it was considered by Mr. Elphinstone in a state of prosperity; but on the 16th July 1821 the raja was shot in his own palace by one of his own sillahdars, named Syajee Bajee, and died the same evening. He left an infant son, during whose minority it was intended the state affairs should be managed by his mother and the family priest; but dissentions soon arose, which again required the intervention of the British. In fact, the disordered state of the police, and the insubordination of the raja's vassals (over whom in the remote tracts he had no control), the number of strongholds among the western ghauts, the lawless habits of the population, and the vicinity to Sawuntwarree, all combined to keep this petty principality in a state of perpetual combustion. In 1827 the raja himself became refractory, which occasioned the advance of a British detachment, on the approach of which he agreed to disband his numerous levies, and remain quiet as long as he could, being of a most unsettled disposition.

The articles are accompanied by references to some of the authorities from whence they are extracted, which serve at once to verify the statements and to direct the reader who is in search of more detailed information.

Royal Asiatic Society of Great Britain and Ireland.

February 2, 1828.—The general meeting of the Society was held this day at 2 o'clock p.m.; Sir Alexander Johnston, V.P., in the chair.

The following donations were presented:

From Wm. Goodhugh, Esq., his Gate to the Arabic, Hebrew, and Syriac unlocked. From the Société Asiatique of Paris, No. I. of the Nouveau Journal Asiatique.

From the Proprietors of the Foreign Review and Continental Miscellany, No. 1 of that work.

From Mr. W. Huttmann, two small pieces of Ceylonese artillery, captured by Gen. Brownrigg from the King of Candy. Gen. B. afterwards presented them to his Royal Highness the late Duke of York. The barrels of these pieces are ornamented with silver plate.

Professor H. A. Hamaker, of Leyden, was elected a foreign member of this Thomas Herbert Maddock, Esq., agent to the Governor-general at Saugor, was elected a non-resident member, and the following gentlemen resident members of the Society: Lieut. Col. John Briggs; John Crawfurd, Esq.; Wm. Alex. Mackinnon, Esq., M.P.; Colin Rogers, Esq., M.D.

The reading of the Journal of a Route through the Western Part of Makran, by Captain N. P. Grant, in the year 1809, under the orders of Brigadier (now Major) General Malcolm, was commenced.

The first part of this paper consists of short notices of the face of the country, and of the villages and towns met with on the route; most of them appear to be of a poor description, consisting of mat huts, and generally a small mud fort. Among others is mentioned Cusercund, situated in a fertile valley, about twenty-one miles in breadth; the Cajoo nullah runs through it. The cultivated portion is about eight miles in circumference; the town, which consists of 500 huts and a mud fort, stands on the west side. It is plentifully watered from twenty-five large springs, and produces wheat, dates, and rice, in great abundance. In Makran, wheat is reaped at the end of March or beginning of April, dates in June, and rice in September. The Sheikh of this territory is independent; but his whole revenue does not exceed 1,000 rupees a year.

The principal object of Capt. Grant's mission being to ascertain the possibility of an European army penetrating through this country to Sind, two routes are mentioned as macticable, and are described in detail.

Makran is divided among a number of petty chieftains; the principal are those of Keij, Geh, Bunpore, Bawoo, Surbaz, Dezee, Penjgore, and Balalı. Keij is condered the chief city of Makran, and Geh the second; the former is situated about 120 miles east of Cusercund, in a mountainous country, opposite to one of the ghauts. Makran was conquered by Nusser Khan, chief of Khelat-i-Sewir; but when he died, about fifteen years previous to 1809, either the indolence of his sons, or the small advantage to be derived from the country, caused the authority of his family to be overturned. The whole country can furnish about 25,000 men; but in the state of the country it would be impossible to make them act together. Their arms are the match-lock, word, shield, and large knife. A great number of them are employed by the Arabs in their dows and ships at Muscat; they are reckoned very faithful.

February 16.—The Society met this day at the usual hour; the Right Hon. Charles W. Williams Wynn, President, in the chair.

The following donations were presented:

From John Hodgson, Esq., the model of a machine for raising water from deep wells, used near Madras.

From H. H. Wilson, Esq., a copy of his Specimens of the Hindu Theatre.

From Capt. John Crisp, Assistant Surveyor General of India, a copy of his work on determining Terrestrial Longitudes.

From J. H. Barrow, Esq., the first number of the Mirror of Parliament.

Wm. Ashburner Morgan, Esq., was admitted a member of the Society.

Brian Houghton Hodgson, Esq., Assistant to the Resident in Nepal, was elected a non-resident member; and Philip Joseph Salomons, Esq. a resident member of the Society.

A short notice, accompanied by a translation, of an inscription in the Buddha cave temples at Kenera, by Dr. B. G. Babington, Sec. R.A.S., was read.

The object of this inscription seems to have been one very commonly adopted among the Buddlas, viz. to excite religious feeling in their votaries by the erection of figures of the deity, accompanied by suitable exhortations. The purport of it is of comparatively little importance: but the character in which it is written having been considered a unknown (like those at the temples of Mahamaleipuram near Madras, which, with native assistance, were decyphered by Dr. B.); the object of this communication is to remove such an idea, calculated to diminish interest in an inquiry, which must be considered of great importance, either in regard to the extent of the Buddhist doctrine, or its connexion with an early and interesting period of Indian history.

The caves of Kenera were described some years since in an article in the Calcutta Journal, by Dr. Babington, but it was not until a considerably later period that he was enabled, by the assistance of one of Col. Mackenzie's Jain Brahmans, to decypher this ascription.

The reading of a paper by Dr. Buchanan Hamilton was commenced. This paper tontains some curious and interesting details of the history and manners of the ancient Hindu kingdom of Kamrup; which comprehended, according to the information to the information of the part of Dacca R.) and of Srihotto Sylhet R.), together with Munipoor, Jaintya, Cachar, and Assam.

The general meeting adjourned to Saturday, March 1st, at 2 o'clock.

VARIETIES.

ASIATIC SOCIETY OF CALCUTTA.

A meeting of the Asiatic Society was held on the 5th September, the Hon. W. B. Bayley, Esq., vice-president, in the chair.

In consequence of formal intimation not having been given, that an election of a president would take place at this meeting, it was resolved that the election should be postponed till the next meeting, when previous notice should be circulated.

Dr. Tytler having read several papers connected with the circumstances of his late appointment as naturalist of the expedition proceeding in search of traces of La Perouse, it was resolved, that the letter of the secretary to the government of Van Diemen's Land should be received as a satisfactory explanation of the circumstances which prevented Dr. Tytler's accomplishing the objects to which his attention had been directed by the Society, on his departure from Calcutta. A number of specimens, collected by Dr. Tytler, were laid on the table, a specification of which will be submitted at a future opportunity.

A number of minerals were presented by Mr. E. Sterling to the museum, collected on the New Road; a descriptive list explained their site and geological peculiarities. The same gentleman presented a specimen of the matrix of the diamond, as found at the Punna mines, and a number of old coins found in Malwa, bearing the impressions of the Khilji sovereigns of Mando. Several coins also were presented by Mr. Halhed, through Mr. Bayley, which were dug up at Sehaswan, or Saswan, a fortress built upon the ruins of a Hindu fort, destroyed by Baber early in the sixteenth century. bear on one side the apparent outlines of a figure, and on the other the words Deva, or Mahadeva, but very rudely and indistinctly executed.

Several papers were received from Mr. Hodgson, descriptive of the written characters and classical writings of Nepal, and of the series of Bauddha teachers venerated in that country. Also a drawing and description of the celebrated column near Bettiyah, on which the same characters are inscribed as those on the Lat of Firoz Shah, at Dehli, and on rocks in Orissa, and have baffled, hitherto, every attempt to decypher them. Some of them resemble Greek, and others Ethiopic letters; but the resemblance is too partial to admit of any satisfactory identification. The pillar in question stands near the village of Mathiya, about eleven miles W.N.W. of Bettiyah, six or seven from the Gunduk river, and about thirty miles from the mountains of Nepal. The whole country, to the base of the mountains, is perfectly free from hills, or even from stones, and there are no vestiges of any building of remarkable character or extent. The pillar is circular and plain, about fifty feet high, and three in diameter, and consists of a single block of granite. It has no base, and is said to extend as far below the surface as above it; an assertion that may be questioned, although it runs several feet under ground. A neat fluted capital is surmounted by a round block, which is carved on its sides with a line of geese pecking the ground, and above which rests a lion couchant. The upper law of the lion has been broken off, but the pillar is in every other respect entire. The inscription is carried round the shaft near the centre, and the characters are perfeetly distinct. Next to the inscription. the subject, that excites curiosity, is the manner in which such a mass could be conveyed to this spot, from a distance so considerable as that of the nearest mountains. The general character of the column is the same as many to be met with in Nepal, and the figure of the lion is precisely that of the animal as presented in the Banddha temples of that king-dom. The Nepalese who have seen the pillar, or the drawing, recognize it as a structure familiar to their religious architecture, but they do not lay any distinct claim to its erection, the history of which is utterly lost.

In connexion with the literature and religion of Tibet, and indeed of the whole of the Bhote countries, we are happy to learn, that the patronage of the government has enabled the Hungarian traveller, Mr. Csoma de Koros, to proceed to Upper Bisahir, to prosecute his Tibetan studies for three years, in which period he engages to prepare a comprehensive grammar and vocabulary of the language, with an account of the literature and history of the country. These objects are the more desirable, as we understand Mr. De Koros considers the recent labours of Klaproth and Remusat, with regard to the language and literature of Tibet, as altogether erroneous. Mons. Remusat, indeed, admits the imperfectness of his materials; but Klaproth, as usual, pronounces ex cathedra, and treats the notion of any successful study of Tibetan, by the English in India, with an ineffable contempt.—Cal. Gov. Gaz.

MEDICAL AND PHYSICAL SOCIETY OF CALCUTTA.

On the 1st September a meeting of this Society was held; Mr. Wilson, the vice-president, in the chair.

The papers for the evening were the description of the operation of lithotomy, as performed by Mr. Tweedle, communicated by Dr. Waddell; and an account of the medical topography of Sandoway, by Mr. Corbyn, the latter of which contained various details of general interest.

Sandoway is situated sixteen miles from the place of anchorage, from which persons arriving proceed through a creek, that winds amidst close and impervious jungle, to the station upon the bank of the stream. The surrounding country is studded with elevations, from the summits of which the most picturesque scenery may be contemplated. These hills are clothed with jungle, in which peacocks, wild fowl, the wild hog, and deer abound. The soil is eminently fertile, and bears an infinite variety of vegetable products, most of which are common to it with Bengal, but many are no doubt peculiar, and promise a rich harvest to the botanist. In the month of March the thermometer, at seven in the morning, is usually about 60°. A perfect calm and heavy dews prevail till towards eleven A.M., when a fine cool sea-breeze sets in, and lasts till the evening; it then lulls, and a fog collects, which makes the nights even unpleasantly chilly. There is very little variation in the climate throughout the year; the heat increases till May, when the rains again reduce the temperature, and are followed by the cold months, which are more chilly here than in Bengal. The people of the country are robust and healthy, but extremely indolent. They are much addicted to smoking, females as well as males, and even children of three or four years old are to be seen enveloped in the fumes of a chcroot. diet consists chiefly of fish; but they are not at all particular, and eat any kind of reptile. There is a great variety of fish, mullet, soles, whitings, a kind of herring, roce, bamalo, and pomphlet, besides oysters and other shell-fish. The rice is coarse, and there is no great variety of pulse. Cattle are scarce, but fowls are abundant, and of a superior description. They constitute the principal food of the Europeans. The huts of the natives are constructed on posts and covered with leaves, which do not wholly exclude the rays of the sun, although sufficient to keep off rain. It is remarkable, that none of the villages stand on the tops of the hills, being built just towards the base. This may have arisen from the natives experiencing the greater unhealthi-ness of such a position, agreeably to the theory, that small elevations in the midst of a country calculated to generate miasmata, are more exposed than lower ground to the influence of the noxious vapours, the less specific gravity of which enables them to rise, until discipated by currents of wind or by extreme rarefaction. It is not to be inferred from this that marsh miasmata are prevalent at Sandoway; on the contrary, it is remarkably free from their supposed efects: but the country all round it abounding with water and wood, thinly inhabited, and rarely cultivated, is of the nature of those districts in which the evolution of deleterious vapours may be expected. In proof of the general healthiness of the place, Mr. C. furnishes reports of the state of the sick of the 60th regiment, upwards of a thousand strong, from December 1825 to February 1827, Immediately after returning from Amherst Island, the corps had above 190 men in hospital; these were speedily reduced to less than half the number, without the casualties being more than ordinarily numerous; as the rains approached the sick again increased, and in May 143 were in hospital. In June they were reduced to fifty-nine, and from that time to the latest date the number gradually diminished, until in February no more than seven were in hospital. The deaths from fever in the whole time were thirty; from bowel complaints, fifty-five, and many of the latter cases were brought on by eating fruit in excess, whilst both were, in a great measure, induced by incautious exposure to vicissitudes of temperature. Another cause of bowel affections was the use of the river water, which is more or less brackish, whilst that of the wells is perfectly sweet. The use of thatches of leaves only admitting the sun is another exciting cause of sickness. and, attention being paid to these circumstances, Mr. Corbyn thinks few stations in India would be found more salubrious. The ulcers which are so frequent and so fatal in many other parts of Aracan are never known to originate here; and cutaneous affections, which are in some degree endemial, are not of a serious character. As compared with Aracan the situation of Sandoway readily explains its superior salubrity, being free from all collections of stagnant water. and more immediately within the influence of the sea-breeze. Ramree is much more completely surrounded by hills and jungle, and the latter appears to be much more contiguous at Cheduba and Amherst Island than at Sandoway, in the immediate vicinity of which there is much open country, and the soil is tilled and dry. With the improvements that must attend a continuance of the present system, the extension of cultivation, formation of roads and paths, and preventing all unnecessary accumulation of moisture and vegetation, Mr. C. is of opinion that before long Sandoway will surpass, in every respect, many of the stations in the H.C.'s provinces. Of the effects of the climate on Europeans there is decisive evidence in its favour. as of the artillery detachment stationed at Sandoway in 1826, only one man died, and no illness ascribable to local causes has ever occurred amongst the officers. although they expose themselves freely in prosecuting those sporting amusements which the jungles yield. At a few miles also from the station is a fine open beach, to which convalescents might be sent with advantage from December to May.

AGRICULTURAL AND HORTICULTURAL SOCIETY OF CALCUTTA.

A meeting of this Society was held the 12th September; the president, W. Leycester, Esq., in the chair.

A communication was read from Baboo Radhakant Deb, upon the soils of the lower provinces, partly from original authorities and partly from personal inquiry and observation. A letter from Captain Twemlow, commanding the artillery at Aurungabad, gave an account of the native prejudice against cutting or transplanting trees during the fortnight of the moon's increase, by a removal at which period, they imagine, the timber decays, and is liable to worm and dry rot. Captain T. is of opinion that the notion is not without some foundation, and the fact merits investigation. summary account of the cultivation of sugar-cane, and the manufacture of sugar in the Ghazipore district, by Mr. Freel, was also laid before the meeting. The secretary announced, that a large parcel of kitchen-garden seeds, despatched from Liverpool in March and April, by Mr. Roscoe, and brought by the Bengal, had been received. It was according resolved, that they should be distributed without delay amongst the members and the native gardeners of Calcutta, with exception of a portion to be reserved for the Society's garden at Allypore. The seeds are packed in twenty-one boxes, lined with lead, some in glass bottles, and others in charcoal. It was also resolved that a portion should be forwarded to gentlemen who had been benefactors to the Society, and who were residents in the countries upon the frontiers of Nepal, Asam, Munipore, Martaban, &c.

The Society is about to publish a volume of proceedings; it is nearly out of the press.—Ind. Gaz.

ASIATIC SOCIETY OF PARIS.

At a meeting of this Society in No. vember last, a report was read by M. E. Burnouf, from the committee appointed by the Society to examine the illustrations of the scenery, architecture, anti-quities, costumes, and natural history of India, proposed to be published by Messrs. T. and W. Daniell, who executed the drawings during ten years' residence in that country. This report is highly flattering to our two countrymen. " The work consists," says the report, " 1st. of general views of temples and pagodas, ancient and modern, in the different parts of India, where the existing monuments of Brahminical worship are the most numerous and remarkable; 2d. designs, exhibiting, with the most scrupulous exactness, the minutest details of their architecture: 3d. sundry representations of the customs and usages of the Hindu people. The religious edifices represented are from all parts of the peninsula, but especially the environs of Bennres. Behar, and Madura." The reporter then subjoins some reflections upon the character of the architecture represented by the pencil of the English artists: "In examining these vast structures in a general point of view, they all appear to be impressed with a peculiar character, which distinguishes them essentially from the remains of Grecian architecture. Whilst the latter are composed of parts inseparable, from the concord of which results the harmony of the whole, insomuch that disjointed they are nothing, and the ensemble cannot exist without them; the Hindu temples, even the most gigantic, are formed by the combination, and (if it may be so expressed) the addition, of parts altogether identical, and which might exist isolated and independent of the edifice to which they appertain, since they re-exhibit exactly all its proportions. Each building is therefore, if we may so describe it, the aggregate of a given number of other buildings, constructed in the same manner but of different dimensions; so that their combination forms, not a whole, but an aggregation similar in the total to the This characseveral component parts. ter, which has not probably been very attentively considered, is perceptible in the most minute details of Indian sculpture; for example, in the singular statues of their deities, which the artist has surcharged intentionally with the same attributes repeated over and over again. Without inquiring at present how far this system of architecture may have been suggested to the Hindus by the aspect of the natural scenes which surround them, and more particularly by the original, though not always just, ideas, which prevail throughout their religious system; it is impossible not to be struck by it, in looking at the edifices drawn by Mr. Daniell. In this respect the collection is replete with new interest. Relics of temples and of sculpture, the study of which may possibly one day throw a light upon the history of the religious notions of the Hindus, are moreover to be found there. A pedestrian statue occurs in the collection, representing, according to popular tradition, the god Crishna, an incarnation of Vishnu, with the dress still worn by the Buddhist priests of Ceylon, and with the curly hair secu on all the effigies of Buddha. curious statue, which is discriminated from other productions of Indian art by its extreme simplicity, was found in Behar, a country which was the very cradle of Buddhism; and this approximation alone suffices to show its importance, and that of the ruins still subsisting in that country, of which Mr. Daniell has nu-merous drawings." The architectural merous drawings." portion of the collection the reporter considers as extremely curious, and more useful than any other existing collection for the study of that art amongst the Hindus; and he concludes with strongly recommending the authors to commence the publication of their work. " It only remains for us to propose to the Council, to manifest in a particular manner the interest which the friends of the sciences and arts of Asia must feel in the splendid undertaking of Mr. Daniell, by publishing in the journal of the Society copious extracts of his prospectus, in order to call the attention of the French public to a work so worthy of the regard of all enlightened men.'

Messrs. Daniell's work, we observe, is patronized by our Royal Asiatic Society; their Committee of Correspondence has issued a circular, strongly recommending the "Illustrations of India," in which they observe: " it is particularly desirable that Messrs. Daniell should be encouraged to publish a selection from their extensive and unrivalled collection of drawings at the present time, for should death or any other circumstance prevent their superintending the publication of them, the collection will probably be lost to the world, as no artist, without possessing local knowledge, could finish their sketches so as to preserve the Indian character of the originals. This loss would be in some instances irreparable, as several of the objects represented have ceased to exist, except in their delineations of them.

Asiatic Journ. Vol. 25. No. 147.

CONVERSION OF THE NATIVES OF INDIA-The following is an extract from the Sumachar Chandrika, a Bengal native paper, on the subject of converting the natives:-" A recent periodical entitled The Missionary Herald, says that there has occurred a great impediment to the conversion of the Hindus into Christianity, which is this; those natives who become Christians are invariably excommunicated from caste, and are therefore debarred by their law from all kinds of inheritance. The missionary gentle-men appear to be of opinion, that the number of their converts would soon multiply if this obstacle were removed. But we assert, that they are much in the wrong if such be their opinion: for intelligent and respectable natives, whether they expect inheritance or not, are always strangers to the efforts of the missionaries, although they have for so many years spared no pains in preaching the Gospel, on the public roads and elsewhere, and distributing religious tracts at a considerable expense; and those few over whom they have triumphed, are the scum of society, and from the lowest and most ignorant classes of the people, who might be prevailed upon to do any thing, as a blind man may be dragged any way the leader pleases.

858

SYRIAN JEWS.

Tiberias is one of the four holy cities of the Talmud, the other three being Szaffad, Jerusalem, and Hebron. It is esteemed holy ground because Jacob is supposed to have resided here, and because it is situated on the lake Genasereth, from which, according to the most generally received opinion of the Tal-mud, the Messiah is to rise. The greater part of the Jews who reside in these holy places do not engage in mercantile pursuits, but are a society of religious persons, occupied solely with their sacred There are among them only two who are merchants and men of property, and these are styled Kafers, or unbelievers, by the others, who do nothing but read and pray. Jewish devotees from all parts of the globe flock to the four holy cities, in order to pass their days in praying for their own salvation, and that of their brethren who remain occupied in worldly pursuits. But the offering up of prayers by these devotees is rendered still more indispensable by a dogma contained in the Talmud, that the world will return to its primitive chaos if prayers are not addressed to the God of Israel at least twice a week in these four cities; this belief produces considerable pecuniary advantage to the supplicants, as the missionaries sent 3 A ahroad abroad to collect alms for the support of these religious fraternities plead the danger of the threatened chaos, to induce the rich Jews to send supplies of money, in order that the prayers may be con-stantly offered up. Three or four missionaries are sent out every year: one to the coast of Africa from Damietta to Mogadore; another to the coasts of Europe from Venice to Gibraltar; a third to the Archipelago, Constantinople, and Anatolia; and a fourth through Syria. The charity of the Jews of London is appealed to from time to time; but the Jews of Gibraltar have the reputation of being more liberal than any others, and from 4,000 to 5,000 Spanish dollars are received annually from them. Jews settled at Tabaria send several collectors regularly into Bohemia and Poland, and the rich Jewish merchants in those countries have their pensioners in the Holy Land, to whom they regularly transmit sums of money. Great jealousy seems to prevail between the Syrian and Polish Jews.

The Jewish devotees pass the whole day in the schools or the synagogue, reciting the Old Testament and the Talmud, both of which many of them know entirely by heart. They all write Hebrew; but I did not see any fine handwriting amongst them; their learning seems to be on the same level as that of the Turks, among whom an Olema thinks he has attained the pinnacle of knowledge if he can recite all the Koran together with some thousand of Hadeath, or sentences of the prophet, and traditions concerning him; but neither Jews, nor Turks, nor Christians, in these countries, have the slightest idea of that criticism which might guide them to a rational explanation or emendation of their sacred books. It was in vain that I put questions to several of the first rabbis, concerning the desert in which the children of Israel sojourned for forty years! I found that my own scanty knowledge of the geography of Palestine, and of its partition amongst the twelve tribes, was superior to theirs.

They observe a singular custom here in praying; while the Rabbi recites the Psalms of David, or the prayers extracted from them, the congregation frequently imitate, by their voice or gestures, the meaning of some remarkable passages: for example, when the Rabbi pronounces the words, "praise the Lord with the sound of the trumpet," they imitate the sound of the trumpet through their closed fists. When "a horrible tempest" occurs, they puff and blow to represent a storm; or should he mention "the cries of the righteous in distress," they all set up a loud screaming; and it not unfrequently happens that while some are still blowing the storm, others have already begun the cries of the righteous; thus forming a concert which it is difficult for any but a zealous Hebrew to hear with gravity.—Burchkardt's Travels in Syria.

IDENTITY OF THE HINDOOSTANEE AND THE IRISH TONGUES.

In Whiter's Etymologicon Universale (1. 377) an instance of apparent resemblance between the Hindoostanee and Celtic languages is pointed out, and followed up by this remark:—" We shall not wonder at this resemblance between the Hindoostanee dialects and the Celtic forms of speech, when we learn what has been asserted, that a Russian, passing through a street in London, was enabled to understand two Irish women, talking their own language, from his knowledge of the Hindostance dialects." This assertion (we beg pardon of the assertior for saying) we disbelieve.

THE CHANK FISH.

" I have been informed," says Sir Everard Home, "by a friend who, while in the East-Indies, saw the chank (a shell belonging to the same genus with the voluta pyrum of Linnaeus) shed its eggs, that the animal discharged a mass of mucus, adapted to the form of the lin of the shell, and several inches in length; this rope of eggs, enclosed in mucus, at the end which is last disengaged was of so adhesive a nature, that it became attached to the rock or stone on which the animal deposited it. As soon as the mucus came in contact with the salt water it coagulated into a firm membranous structure, so that the eggs became enclosed in membranous chambers, and the nidus, having one end fixed and the other loose, was moved by the waves, and the young in the eggs had their blood acrated. When the young were hatched, they remained defended from the violence of the waves till their shells had acquired strength,"-Phil. Trans. vol. 107.

THE NAGA PANCHAMI.

In most parts of India, the 28th July is known as the Naga Panchami, and the worship is addressed to the principal Nagas, or snake-gods. These are not to be confounded with vulgar snakes, atthough presiding over those reptiles, as they have the power of assuming what shapes they will; and their maidens, like the fairies and nymphs of the Arabian Nights, are remarkable for their personal charms, which they not unfrequently bestow upon favoured heroes or kings. The whole tribe reside in the regions immediately below the earth, which are the seat of exhaustless treasures, and where the blaze of inestimable gems supplies the absence of the solar radiance. names of the principal Nagas are enumerated by different authorities, and extend to about a dozen, all of whom are to be invoked, and propitiated on the occasion, with offerings of milk and ghee. The leaves of the nimb are also to be kept in the house, and a small quantity eaten. The offerings in Bengal are usually made to a branch of the Snuhi, or Euphorbia, but the rite is little observed except in the villages, and there with little solemnity. In the west and south of India it is much more regarded, and we have the personal testimony of the late Captain Fell, that the Naga-panchami, in the latter, is a holiday on which athletic sports, wrestling, jumping, &c. take place. He has also cited the following directions for the worship from the Khasi Khand: "The fifth lunar day of Sravana is held sacred to the Nagas: on that day let ab-lutions be performed in the pool termed Vasuki, or sacred to Vasuki, the lord of the Nagas; by observing this ceremony the Nagas are pleased, and the votaries may rest free from the dread of serpents. People should collect together for animsement and worship; the door-posts should be smeared with cow-dung, and figures should be drawn of deadly poisonous serpents, and offerings should be made to the Nagas of ghee, durva grass, kusa grass, and flowers; also of perfumes and garlands, and the like. The drawings of the serpents should represent them armed with seymitars and shields. The upper part of the body, from the navel, should be that of a human being, and the lower part that of a scrpent; hoods must be extended over the heads, and entwined with any odd number of snakes: all these must be of a deep black hue, and painted either in the open highway or in the house. This fifth day of Sravana is a day of festival among the Nagas; let their images, therefore, be bathed with milk. In the south of India the day is also called Garura-panchami, the bird garura being the implacable enemy of the serpents, and his protection therefore obviating any necessity to propitiate them-Worship is also offered to Sesha, the many-headed serpent on which Vishnu sleeps, and whose expanded hoods form his canopy. The worship of the Nagas appears to be a very ancient part of the Hindu religion, and suggests very enrious identifications with the ceremonies and traditions of all the nations of antiquity. -Cal. Gov. Gaz.

RAIN IN BOMBAY.

A register of the pluviometer in Bombay gives the following results, respecting the fall of rain in the months of June and July for the last eleven years:

| Years. |  | June.   |       | July.   |       | Total.  |  |
|--------|--|---------|-------|---------|-------|---------|--|
|        |  | Inches. |       | Inches. |       | Inches. |  |
|        |  |         |       | 23.67   |       |         |  |
| 1818   |  | 22.54   |       | 17.69   | •••   | 40.23   |  |
| 1819   |  | 15.95   |       | 30.66   |       |         |  |
| 1820   |  | 18.82   | • • • | 28:37   | •••   | 47.19   |  |
| 1821   |  | 15.18   |       | 20.66   | • • • | 35.84   |  |
| 1822   |  | 29.21   | •••   | 26.59   | •••   | 55.80   |  |
|        |  |         |       | 15.96   |       |         |  |
|        |  |         |       | 8.7     |       |         |  |
|        |  |         |       | 25.17   |       |         |  |
|        |  |         |       | 26.97   |       |         |  |
|        |  |         |       | 10 29   |       |         |  |
|        |  |         |       |         |       |         |  |

MODERN EGYPT.

Extract of a letter from an English traveller in Egypt:-" We have been greatly struck by the contrast which presents itself in this country, where modern institutions jostle the relics of remotest times, and you may turn from a mnmmy to a newly drilled recruit, or mark the effects of European machinery, in a manufactory constructed of stones covered with hieroglyphics. From the Turks generally we have experienced much civility. It is true, that Christians generally ride donkies, but so do Turks, for these animals in Egypt are of singular docility and Those who prefer horses may beauty. mount them with impunity. The Pasha's new levies consist of five brigades, each of five battalions, each eight hundred strong. We saw one regiment exercised, and the movements were as steady, and the firing as regular, as on any parade in India. The French officers act as instructors only, and are not allowed to exercise any authority over the men. The word of command was given by a Turk, and all the officers are of that nation, except some of the subalterns, who are Arabs. Osman Beg, the major general, is a man of unassuming and polished manners. The service is far from popular in Egypt, and is, in every individual case, compulsory. The Pasha is every thing in Egypt: sovereign, legislator, manufacturer, farmer, and money-changer, und admits no interference with his various avocations. few days before our arrival at Cairo he hanged a Jew for taking one piastre more than the prescribed number in exchange for a dollar. He has made Arabs manufacture as well as use muchinery, and set them to work to learn French, and translate scientific works into Arabic. innovations, however, are not interwoven with the character of the people, on whom the Pasha's improvements appear to have wrought no change. As long as they stand in awe of him they will labour; but the moment that feeling ceases, they will retain only that disgust they now entertain for tasks to which they are urged by a despotic, and not unfrequently cruel master. The war with Greece has cleared the villages of Arab youth, such of whom as had avoided the conscription having fled into the deserts. Parties were frequently met with on the route, loud in their execrations of the Pasha, and threatening every Turk with death."

MONKEY MARRIAGE.

About twenty years ago, Ishwara Chandra, the Raja of Nudeeya, spent 100,000 rupees (£12,500) in marrying two monkeys, when all the parade common at Hindoo marriages was exhibited. In the marriage procession were seen elephants, camels, horses richly caparisoned, palanqueens, lamps, and flambeaux; the male monkey was fastened in a fine palanqueen, having a crown upon his head, with men standing by his side to fan him; then followed singing and dancing girls in carriages; every kind of Hindoo music; a grand display of fireworks, &c. Dancing, music, singing, and every degree of low mirth, were exhibited at the bridegroom's palace for twelve days together. At the time of the marriage ceremony, learned Brahmins were employed in reading the formula from the Shastras .- Ward's View of the Hindus.

VACCINATION IN TURKEY.

From the last official report of the Na. tional Vaccine Establishment to the Secretary of State for the Home Depart-ment, dated 11th February 1828, just laid before Parliament, we extract the following passage respecting the exten-sion of vaccination in Turkey:

" In proof of its wider diffusion, we learn that it is now practised, not only throughout the Morea and the countries inhabited by the Greeks, but that it has been admitted into Constantinople, and into the palace of the Sultan, in spite of the prejudices which the religion of the Mahometans opposes to any measure intended to interfere with the destinics of life. So that the advantages which this country derived from the east in the last century, by the acquisition of inoculation from thence, it has now abundantly requited, by imparting to the same region the safer practice of vaccination, by which the small-pox, equal to their own plague in the severity of its visitations, has been already disarmed of its terrors, and in the course of years may, possibly, be extinguished altogether."

NEW PUBLICATIONS.

LONDON.

The English in India. By the Author of "Pandurang Hari," and "The Zenana." 3 vols. 12mo.

£1.4£

The Subaltern's Log-Book; including Anecdotes of well-known Military Characters, with Scenes and Customs in India. 2 vois. post-two. £1.1s. Part IV. of Scenery, Costime, and Architecture, chieffy in Western Initia. By Capt. R. M. Grindlay, In atlas 4to. £2.2.

Journal of the Rev. Joseph Wolff, Missionary to the Jews; comprising his second visit to Palestine and Syria, in the years 1823 and 1824. Edited and revised by H. Drummond, Eaq. Vol. 11. 8vo. 7s. A Visit to the Seven Churches of Asia, with an Excursion into Piskias. By the Rev. V. J. Arundall, British Chaplain at Smyrna. 8vo., with Map and Plates.

Excursion into Pistaia. By the Rev. V. J. Arundall, British Chaplain at Smyrna. 8vo., with Map and Plates.

Memoire of the Life of the Right Hon. George Camning. 2 vols. post-8vo. £1. is.

The Bast-India Register and Directory, corrected to the 26th January 1828. By A. W. Mason, Geo. Owen, and G. H. Brown, of the Secretary's Office, East-India House. 12mo. 10s.

Select Specimens of the Theatre of the Hindus, translated from the Original Sanscrit, containing the Dramas of Mrichchakati, Vikrama and Urvai, Malati and Madhava, Uttara Rama Cheritra, Mudra Rakshasa, and Ratnavali; together with and Account of the Dramatic System of the Hindus, Notices of their different Dramas, &cc. By H. H. Wilson, Esq. (Imported from Calcutta.) 3 vols. 8vo. £1. 10s.

The Marriage in Cana, a Poem. By the Rev. E. Smedley, A. M. 8vo. 2s. 6d.

An Appeal to England against the New India Stamp Act, with some Observations on the Condition of British Subjects in Calcutta, under the Stamp Act, with some Observations on the Condition of British Subjects in Calcutta, under the Government of the East-India Company, 8vo. 3s. A Portrait of the Right Hon. Lady Jembna Isabella Mann, daughter of Earl Cornwallis; engraved from a painting by Pickersgill, R.A., for the Collection of Portraits of the Female Nobility. Narrative of a Journey through the Upper Provinces of India, from Calcutta to Bombay. By the Right Rev. Reginald Heber, late Lord Bishop of Calcutta. With a Map, and several Illustrative Plates from the author's own Sketches. 2 vols. 4to. £4, 14s. 6d.

The Kuzzilbash, a Tale of Khorasan. 3 vols. post 8vo. £1. 11s. 6d.

Memoirs of the Life and Travels of John Ledyard, the African Traveller. Now first published from his Journals and Correspondenne. Post 8vo.

A New Persian Grammar, containing, in a scrics of concise and perspicuous rules, a distinct view of the elementary principles of that useful and elegant language. By Duncan Forbes, A.M., and Sandford Arnot. 8vo.

In the Press.

Hamilton's East-India Gaesticer (second edition), greatly enlarged and improved by the author from the most authentic materials, and brought down to the end of 1827. 2 vols. 8vo. Poetival Compositions, containing among others descriptive Sketches of the Mr. Scenery of Southern Africa, and of the Chracter and Condition of its Native Tribes. Written during the author's residence in that country. By T. Pringle. Takes of a Military Life. By the author of the 'Military Sketch Book.' 3 vols. Military Refoctions on Turkeys. By Baron Von Valentini, major-general in the Prussian service. Haiji Baba in England. By the auchor of Haiji Baba."

CALCUTTA.

Documents illustrative of the Burman War, consisting of Public Despatches and other Official and Demi-Official Communications, praceded by a Historical Sketch of the Events of the War; with Historical Sketch of the Events of the War; with a Map. 4to. 24 Rs.

Chap. I. of Book I. of an Essay on Tarse or Public Revenue; the ultimate incidence of their anyment; their disbursement; and the seats of their ultimate consumption. 8vo. 4 Rs.

Poems, by H. I. V. Derozia. 12mo. 8vo. 4 Rs.

Reports of Cases determined in the Court of Niceanut Aducuts, with Tables of the Names of the Cases and principal Matters. A new Edition containing the whole of the Cases as before principally the Court of the Cases and Principal Matters. A new Edition Containing the whole of the Cases as before principally the Court of the Cases and Principal Matters. A new Edition Containing the whole of the Cases as before principally the Court of the Cases and Principal Matters. A new Edition Containing the whole of the Cases as before principal with the Court of the Cases and Principal Matters. A new Edition Containing the William Containing the William Cases and Principal Matters. A new Edition Containing the William Cases and Principal Matters. A new Edition Containing the William Cases and Principal Matters. A new Edition Containing the William Cases and Principal Matters. A new Edition Containing the William Cases and Principal Matters. A new Edition Containing the William Cases and Principal Matters. A new Edition Containing the William Cases and Principal Matters. A new Edition Cases and Principal ## College Gramination.

COLLEGE OF FORT WILLIAM,

20th August 1827.

THE following minute, recorded by the Right Honourable the Acting Visitor of the College of Fort William, on a review of the proceedings of the institution for the year 1826-7, is published for general information, under directions received from his Lordship to that effect :-

" The usual time having elapsed since the publication of the annual review of the proceedings of the College, the duty devolves upon me, as the representative of the Right Honourable the Visiter, during his absence from the presidency, of recording my sentiments on the transactions of the institution within the last year.

" Although my connexion with the College, and consequently my acquaintance with the details of its affairs. has been of short duration, yet I need scarcely declare, that I have felt the liveliest interest in the progress of the institution, and an anxious desire to preserve it in a state of efficiency.

" While I concur in the regret expressed by the College Council in the result of the late annual examination, at which no student was reported qualified for the public service, I have much pleasure in observing, on a consideration of the whole proceedings of the year, that during the period under review, seventeen students have qualified themselves, at intermediate examinations, since June 1826, by their proficiency in two of the prescribed languages taught in the College; a number exceeding by two that of the preceding year, and, with the exception of 1821-25, in which nineteen students were reported qualified, equal to any of the annual results of the last seven

" It is also satisfactory to remark, that, with one exception, the list of qualified students contains the names of all those who remained attached to the College after the annual examination in June last year. To the student who forms the one exception, I shall refrain from adverting to more pointedly, in the hope that, as he has since obtained a competent knowledge in one language, he will in the seclusion of a Mofussil station, to which he has been removed, exert himself strenuously to redeem the time he has lost.

" The following are the students who have qualified themselves for employment in the past year :-

" Messrs. C. Bury, D. Pringle, A. C. Heyland, J. P. Gubbins, A. Spiers, W. Armstrong, G. T. Thompson, J. Grant, A. M. Mills, C. G. Mansell, W. R. Kennaway, C. C. Jackson, G. M. Bat-ten, C. E. Trevelyan, C. M. Caldecott, B. Fitzgerald, and G. H. Smith.

" It is with peculiar gratification that I select from the report before me, the following instances of superior talents and exemplary assiduity, which have been marked by the distinction of honorary rewards.

" Mr. John Penton Gubbins was admitted as a student of the institution on the 31st May 1826, and was reported qualified in Bengalee in August, and in Persian in November of the same year: a medal of merit having been awarded to him for the rapidity with which his acquirements in the former language were made.

" Mr. George Trewen Thompson became a student of the institution on the 27th February 1826, and was reported qualified in Hindee in August following, and in October following of the same year in Persian: a pecuniary prize of eight hundred rupees having been awarded to him for high proficiency in the latter language.

"Mr. Colville Coverly Jackson became on the 26th a member of the institution on the 26th of June 1826; in the following October he passed a creditable examination in Hindee, a medal of merit having been awarded to him for rapid and considerable progress in that language; and he was reported qualified for the public service after passing an examination in Persian in February 1827.

" Mr. George Maxwell Batten was admitted into College on the 23d of October 1826, and he passed an examination on the 21st of the following November in Persian, receiving a medal for his rapid acquirements in that language, and, after passing an examination in Bengalee in January, he was reported duly qualified to enter on the discharge of his public duties.

" Mr. Charles Edward Trevelyan commenced his oriental studies on the 21st of October 1826, and the rapidity with which he acquired such a knowledge of two languages as enabled him to pass highly creditable examinations in Hindee on the 21st of the following November, exactly one month after he entered the College, and in Persian on the 19th of December, not quite two months after his admission, is no less surprising than it is without an example in the annals of the College.

" In the half-yearly report in December last, speaking of Mr. Trevelyan, the College Council observes: 'It is difficult to speak in terms sufficiently commendatory of his talents and industry, which, had they been exerted for a short time longer, would have entitled him to the highest rewards, and placed him in the first rank of the most distinguished scholars of the College of Fort William.' Medals of merit were of course awarded to Mr. Trevelyan for rapid and considerable proficiency in the Hindee and Persian languages.

" Mr. Charles Marriott Caldecott became a student of the College on the 23d October 1826, and he passed an examination in Persian in the following December, a medal of merit being awarded to him for his proficiency therein; and he obtained the requisite report of qualification for the public service by his success at a Bengalce examination in February 1827.

" I cannot, however, close this list of distinguished students, without adding to it the name of Mr. Mansell, whose merits are thus conspicuously noticed: Mr. Charles Grenville Mansell entered the institution as a student on the 22d of September 1826, and in the short space of a fortnight afterwards passed an examination in Persian, and on the 21st of December following in Hindce: when, after a period of only three months from the date of his admission into the College, he was declared duly qualified to discharge his public duties. This gentleman brought out with him to India, from the Haileybury College, or acquired it on the voyage, a considerable knowledge of Persian; but on his arrival in this country it appears, by the report of the officer who examined him, that in the Hindee language he could barely read the Nagree character.

" Several of the students above-mentioned might, it may be fairly assumed, have attained to the highest academical honours which the College, under a different system, was formerly able to confer, had they not embraced the option of commencing their carcer of active duty; and while the difficulty exists of meeting the demands of the public service, it is, I think, fortunate that such should have been their election, more especially as I cannot allow myself to doubt, that the industry and talents they have displayed will induce them, in their leisure from official avocations, to cultivate to maturity the seeds of that knowledge, which they have acquired in this and the sister institution.

" It was with much concern that I learned, in December last, the death of Mr. Wilmot, a student, whose exemplary conduct and rapid progress in his studies gave great hopes of future eminence.

" I am sorry to observe, that it has been found necessary within the twelve months under review to remove four studeuts from the College, one of whom, however, returned after a few months' exile, and passed an examination qualify, ing him for public employment.

"Concurring entirely in the sentiments recorded in the minute of the Right Honourable the Visitor, on reviewing the proceedings of the College in the year 1825-26, I did not hesitate to sunport the recommendation of the College Council for the removal of those gentlemen; nor can I refrain, while I express my acknowledgments to the College Council for their unremitting attention to the interests of the institution, to impress upon them the importance of a rigid enforcement of the statutes of the College in that respect, particularly at the present moment, when the large addition to the number of students demands a more than usual degree of vigilant superintendence.

" It is indeed obvious to remark, that amongst a larger number than usual of young men, more instances of inattention and irregularity are likely to occur, and that it is only by a strict application of the provisions, above noticed, to those who show a disposition not to avail themselves of the means of instruction held out to them, that the discipline of the College can be properly secured.

" On the maintenance of that discipline the utility and reputation of the institution must mainly depend; and it is with much pleasure that I recognize in the reports before me ample testimony to the zealous attention of the officers of the College to the duties of their respective departments.

" A list of the literary works published or preparing for publication since the last annual examination will be specified in an appendix; and I shall conclude these remarks with a brief notice of the progress of the institutions under the superintendence of the Committee of Public Instruction, which, though not directly connected with the College of Fort William, has one object in common with it-the training up of a class of public officers, in whose example and influence the moral and intellectual improvement of the people may be confidently anticipated.

" The progress of education in the seminaries under the superintendence of the Committee has been satisfactory. In the Madressa of Calcutta the Arabic language and the mathematics of the west have been assiduously cultivated, and the branches of Mohammedan law, relating chiefly to inheritance, to which less attention

tention was formerly paid than was desirable, have been since studied with very creditable success. A medical class has been added to the establishment. The number of students in this institution is cighty-five.

"In the Sanscrit College of Calcutta, the acquirement of the language and of its literature has been extended in a manner hitherto unknown to the native system of education; and, at the public examination held in January last, considerable conversancy was exhibited with dramatic writings, which have for a long period been scarcely ever perused. An arithmetical class was instituted last year for certain of the pupils, of whom a number have gone through a complete course, and have recently begun algebra. A medical class has also been established in this college, in which the punils study anatomy in works translated from English authors; and since the beginning of this year an English class has been attached to the codege, in which forty of the best Sanscit scholars are engaged in the study of the English language. The establishment comprises ninety-one students on the foundation, and forty-five out-stu-

" It is in the Vidyalaya, however, that the study of English is most successfully prosecuted. At the public examination, held also in January last, the senior classes were examined in natural and experimental philosophy and chemistry, and proved their acquaintance with the language of Shakespear, by declaiming several of his scenes. Since then the first class has been introduced to the elements of mathematical knowledge and to the acquirement of drawing, which may be of service to them in after-hfe. The progress made by the pupils of this College is highly creditable to their own talents and assiduity, and the care with which their studies are superintended. The number of scholars is between four and five hundred, of whom those on the original foundation, and that of the School Society (altogether ninety), remain as before. Subscribers to the Education Fund have been permitted to add to these one free scholar for every 10,000 rupees subscribed, and from part of similar donations small scholarships have been attached to the College, for a number of the pupils of the first class to contribute towards defraying their maintenance, and obviate any urgent necessity for their premature removal from studies of so much interest and importance to themselves, and to the diffusion of useful information.

" The Benares College continues to exhibit the same diligence in the cultivation of studies purely national that it has displayed for some years past. Arrangements have been also made to encourage to a greater extent the useful and necessary study of the laws of the Hindus at this institution, as well as to obtain a more general and finished conversancy with the Sanscrit language. There are ninety-three students on the foundation. and 166 out-students.

"The Agra College, at the last annual examination, contained 121 students in Arabic and Persian, and sixty-three in Sanscrit and Hindee. Their progress in the two former is most respectable; it is retarded in the latter, and especially in Hindee, by the want of books. Some additions have been lately made to the means that exist at this institution of acquiring proficiency in the mathematical sciences.

" At the Delhi College there are forty students in Arabic, fifty in the higher classes of Persian, ninety-seven in the elementary classes, and seventeen in Sanscrit; making in all 201. The elements of astronomy and mathematics, on European principles, have been introduced in this establishment, although its principal objects are the language of Arabia and Mohammedar, law-

" The elementary schools call for no particular remark; the great object of the Committee has been to concentrate these as much as possible, and not to suffer them to consume resources disproportionate to their utility. The schools in Rajpootana accordingly, which were formerly scattered over an extent of country which rendered superintendence in a great measure nugatory, have been reduced, and one establishment at Aimere substituted in their room.

" As an essential instrument in the diffusion of knowledge, as much activity as possible has been given to the circulation of printed books, and supplies have been furnished through the Committee to the establishments under their superintendence, and others of a similar character. Above 7,000 volumes have been thus distributed in little more than two years. Encouragement has been also given to the publication of useful works, and several of those announced last year as in progress, have been completed or considerably advanced, and others have been undertaken. A select library of English books has been also attached to the Anglo-Indian College.

" Besides the maintenance and improvement of those establishments which have already been founded, and the supply of them with the implements of instruction, as far as the resources at the disposal of the Committee will allow, the Committee have received from such of their members as are-Absent with the [MARCH.

Right Honourable the Governor General, useful information regarding the state of education in some of the places visited by them, and some suggestions for the extension of collegiate establishments, which will be the subject of future consideration. The necessity for multiplying such institutions is every where lamentably evident, but the vastness of the claim precludes the possibility of universally complying with it. As far as practicable, however, the demand will receive attention; and although a considerable interval must clapse before any sensible effect can be produced upon the character of the people, it is impossible that consequences of the most beneficial tendency should fail to reward the persevering efforts which are now making to animate intellectual exertion, and facilitate the acquirement of knowledge.

" By the departure to England of their late president, Mr. Harington, the Committee have been deprived of an able and zealous director of their labours, whose superior acquirements, and knowledge of the habits and feelings of the people, peculiarly fitted him for presiding at their deliberations, and whose mind was ardently bent on the great work of diffusing the blessings of improved education throughout our extensive empire.

" Combernere."

APPENDIX.

Works in the Native Languages, or connected with Eastern Literature, lately published, or now preparing for publication.

The Bulurool Wusect, a general Arabic Lexicon, explained in Persian, by Abdoor Ruheem and Kauzim Alee, Molowees of the College of Fort William. The plan of this work is designed to empace the whole compass of the Arabic language, and, referring to the learning and abilities of the editor, it is reasonable to expect that it will be finished in the most useful and satisfactory manner.

A new edition of the Raj Nevat, a Hindee class book, edited by Captain Price, professor of Hindoostance at the institution, for the use of the College of Fort William.

An abridged edition of Dr. Carey's Bengalee Dictionary, in two volumes 8vo., by Mr. Marshman, of Serampore.

A new English Translation of Ferishta's Persian History of Hindoostan, in three 4to volumes, by Colonel Briggs, of the Bombay establishment.

A new edition of Selections, in prose drown the best Persian writers, and originally published by Dr. Lumsden, for the use of the College of Fort William, in five 4to. volumes. The Durool Muktar and Fascol Imadee, two Arabic works on Mahomedan Law, to be published in two large 8vo, volumes, with the preceding volumes of Persian classics, at the lithographic press, under the superintendence of Mr. Wood.

The Elements of Hindoostanee Grammar, by the Reverend Mr. Yates, in one 8yo. volume.

Numbers 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, and 6 of Select Specimens of the Theatre of the Hindus, by Mr. H. H. Wilson, secretary to the Asiatic Society of Bengal.

Speaking of this work, the College Council observe: "they consider themselves fortunate in being able to bear direct testimony to the merits of the pieces which he (Mr. Wilson) has selected for translation, and to the excellence with which he has accomplished his undertaking. They conceive that no orientalist has yet offered to the literary world a contribution of greater value and interest, or one of which the patronage will more enhance the reputation of Government.

List of Works lately published or preparing for Publication, under the Superintendence of the Committee of Public Instruction.

SANSCRIT.

Works begun last year-since completed.

The Mugdhabodha and the Laghu Kaumudi, grammars.

The Bhasha Parichheda, an elementary work on Logic, with a Commentary.

In the Pross.

The Bhatta Kavya; 700 pages have been printed.

The Sahitya Durpana, an elementary work on Rhetoric.

The Raghu Vansa, a classical poem. The Lilavati, or Hindu Arithmetic. Preparing for Publication.

A Translation into Sanscrit of the outlines of Anatomy.

PERSIAN. (In the Press.)
The Seir Mutakherin, which will be completed in a few days.

Translations from the Digdursum, or Bengali Versions of various Tracts on European Literature and Science. This will also be soon completed

The Persian Translation of the Lilavati, nearly completed.

ARABIC. (In the Press.)

The Fatawa Alemgiri, of which 350 pages have been printed.

Translation of Bridge's Elements of Algebra.

An Abridgment of the Canons of Avicenna, with a Persian Translation and English Glossary of technical terms.

College of Fort William, June 30, 1327.

Twenty seventh Annual Examination.

| - 0                                                                                              |                                                                            |                                                    |                                                                             |
|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|----------------------------------------------------------------------------|----------------------------------------------------|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| Persian.                                                                                         | Date of Admissioninto College.                                         | Number of Lec-tures attendedthis Term.     | Period of attendance on the Lec-                                            |
| 2. Read, M                                                                                       | Sept. 1826June 1826Dec. 1826                                       | 344038333539443134 | Ms. Ws. 11 0 5 3 8 3 11 0 5 3 5 2 8 1 5 1 5 3                               |
| 10. Woodcock,W. H.                                                                               | Oct. 1825Re-admit.Jan. 1827                                        | }16                                                | 3 1                                                                         |
| 11. Lang                                                                                         | Dec. 1826Dec. 1826Jan. 1827                                        | 43943                                      | 5 21 05 1                                                           |
| Third Class. 14. Halkett                                                                         | June 1997                                                                  | 1016725                            | $\begin{array}{cccc} 2 & 0 \\ 4 & 1 \\ 0 & 3 \\ 0 & 0 \\ 1 & 0 \end{array}$ |
| 20 Dick                                                                                          | Jan. 1827Jan. 1827May 1827June 1827June 1827               | 4231722                            | 5 24 40 00 00 0                                             |
| 25. Qumtm26. Fraser27. Grant28. Bentall29. Taylor30. Trotter31. Cunliffe | May 1827May 1827May 1827May 1827                               | 12404453               | 0 0 0 0 1 0 2 0 2 0 2 0 3 0 3 0 1 0 0                                       |
| Absent from Examina-tion.                                                                    | Jan. 1827Jan. 1827Jan. 1827June 1827June 1827June 1827 | 915701110              | 4 2 5 1 5 2 0 0 0 0 0 0 0 0 0 0 0 0 0 0 0 0 0 0                             |

| Hindee.                                                                                                               | Date of Admission                            | into the College.                                            | Number of Lec-tures attendedthis Term. | Period of Attend-               | tures.                               |
|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|----------------------------------------------|--------------------------------------------------------------|------------------------------------------------|---------------------------------|--------------------------------------|
| First Class.  1. Read, F. E  2. Tulioh                                                                                | Jan.Dec.                                 | 18271826                                                 | 4638                                       | Ms.55                   | Ws.23                        |
| Second Class. 3. Grant                                                                                                | May                                          | 182718271826                                         | 1445                                   | 0 0 8                           | 221                          |
| Third Class. 6. Bentall                                                                                               | May                                          | 182718271827                                         | 551                                    | 0 0                             | 2 2                                  |
| Absent from Examination.  1. Home 2. Ogdvy 3. Sturt 4. Martin 5. Deane 6. Bruce 7. McKenzle Francis 9. James 9. James | Jan. Jan. June June June June June June June | 1827182718271827                                 | 242461211              | 5500000 | 22201000 |
|                                                                                                                       | Jan.                                         | 1827                                                         | 41                                             | 5                               | 0                                    |
| Second Class. 2. Dick                                                                                                 | April                                        | 182718271826                                         | 381038                                 | 425                     | 0 2                                  |
| Third Class. 5. Bracken 6. Mytton 7. Mc Mahon 8. Udny                                                                 | JuneJune                                 | 1897                                                         | 0135                               | 0 0 0 0                         | 0113                     |
| Fourth Class.  Fourth Class.  Read, M.  Io. Lang.  It. Barlow  L. Buller  Scott.  Trotter  Trotter  Cumtln            | MayMayMayDec.                    | 18261826182718271827182718261826 | 4043257477             | 5551000 | 3200133      |
| Absent from Examination.  1 Woodcock, T. P  2 McLeod                                                                  | JuneJune                                 | 182 71827                                         | 0                                              | 0                               | 0                                    |

By order of the Council of the College, D. RUDDELL, Sec. C. C.

ASIATIC INTELLIGENCE.

oralcutta.

GOVERNMENT GENERAL ORDERS.

PALAMBANG PRIZE-MONEY.

For Wiliam, July 27, 1827.—The Hon. the Court of Directors having transmitted copies of the statements of the prize agents and the prize lists, for the 1st distribution on account of the capture of Palambang in the year 1812, the unclaimed shares of which have been paid into their treasury, the Right Hon. the Vice-President in Council is pleased to direct that all claimants belonging to the Hon. Company's troops of the Bengal establishment shall submit their claims to participate in that prize-money, through the prescribed channels, to the general prize-committee at the presidency.

The Vice-President in Council is further pleased to direct that the general prize committee submit, for the consideration and orders of government, all claims investi-gated and passed by the subordinate committees, such appearing to the general committee to be established; and on their receiving the sanction of government, the military auditor general, as a member of the general prize committee, will pass them; the bills will then be returned to the station committees for the purpose of being presented to the nearest paymaster, who will pay the amount to the president of the committee, by whom the shares of individuals are to be discharged, the president obtaining a receipt for the share paid to each individual, which he is to forward for record to the committee at the presidency.

Agreeably with the tenor of the Act 1st and 2d of Geo. IV., cap. 61, claims may be preferred for six years from the present date, for the above piize-money, after the expiration of which period no claim can be received.

ABSENCE OF OFFICERS ON STAFF EMPLOYMENT.

Fort William, Aug. 17, 1827. — The Hon. the Court of Directors having determined that not more than five officers shall be simultaneously absent on staff employment from any one corps, whether cavalry or infantry, the Right Hon. the Vice-President in Council, with the concurrence of the Governor-general, is pleased, at the earnest recommendation of the Commander-in-chief, to establish, on this head, a further restriction as to the grades from which the five individuals are to be taken.

The efficiency of the army in all its branches being of the last consequence, it is deemed highly expedient towards the attainment of so important an object, that a proper number of experienced officers should be present with every regular regiment, to contribute their aid in sustaining its discipline, and in diffusing that confidence amongst the native officers and men which conduces so essentially to the wellbeing of an army constituted as is that of Bengal. To secure, therefore, as far as the means at disposal will admit, the services with every corps of a portion of competent officers, the number of regimental captains that may be absent at one time from the same corps of the line, on staff or other permanent public employment, is restricted to two.

The measure here indicated as calculated to conduce to the greater efficiency of the army, is designed to be wholly prospective, and by no means to affect present incumbents of the grade of captain, unless in such cases of emergency as his Exc. the Commander-in-chief may feel constrained to bring to the special notice of Government.

To obviate all occasion for references, and for decisions on particular cases hereafter, the Vice-President in Council is pleased to announce, as a rule for future guidance, that when two captains are absent from a corps in public situations, and a subaltern of the same corps, holding also a detached staff situation, comes to be promoted to the rank of regimental captain, the officer so promoted shall be the individual to vacate his appointment under the operation of these orders.

Government having also taken into consideration the practicability of rendering the regular army, upon the whole, more efficient in point of European officers, and being of opinion that, with the exception, for a season, of the local battalion serving in Assam, it is quite unnecessary that to any local or irregular corps should be attached more than a commandant, an adjutant, and, where such appointment has been sanctioned, a second in command; all officers in excess to those above enumerated, who are now doing duty with any irregular corps or local battalion, are remanded forthwith to their regiments.

Still further to promote the desirable end herein contemplated, of giving to the army every advantage which can accrue from an accession to the number of European officers available for regimental duty, his Lordship in Council, with the concurrence of the Governor-general, has determined determined that whenever an escort with a resident at a foreign court, or with a political agent, is furnished from the troops of the line, the services of a distinct officer permanently appropriate to the command of such escort are unnecessary. In all such cases, therefore, the appointment of commandment of the escort is to be abolished on the receipt of these orders, and the officers who have been officiating in that capacity, or who may be doing duty with escorts so circumstanced, are to join their respective regiments, should no political charge operate in bar to their so

Under the circumstances adverted to above, when the escort or guard furnished to a resident or political agent is relieved weekly from the regular troops cantoned in the immediate vicinity of the residency, no necessity whatever will exist for detaching a European officer from his corps on a tour of duty with it; but when the cantonment from which the relief is effected is so distant as to render a monthly or longer tour of duty more convenient than a weekly one, the officer commanding the troops from which the escort is furnished will consider it to be his duty to meet the wishes of the resident or political agent, for the uninterrupted employment of any regimental officer (who has served three years with his corps) on such duty, whilst his regiment may continue at the station giving the escort.

The arrangements described in the previous paragraph do not affect officers commanding permanent escorts comprised of men unconnected with the regular service; from their operation will be exempted also escorts, whether composed of troops of the line or otherwise, which may be furnished for missions or occasional embassies to foreign courts beyond the limits of India Proper.

SUB-ASSISTANTS COMMISSARY GENERAL.

Fort William, Aug. 17, 1827 .- To provide for the due performance of commissariat duties, the Right Hon. the Vice-President in Council is pleased to increase the number of sub-assistants commissary general from ten to twelve, the addition now given being in lieu of two extra sub-assistants who formerly held executive charges in the department.

To complete the establishment to the prescribed number, Supernumerary Sub-Assistants Lieut. B. W. Ebhart, of the 10th N.I., and Lieut. H. Doveton, of the 4th N.I., are placed upon the list of permanent sub-assistants in the commissariat department.

RELIEF OF TROOPS.

Head-Quarters, Calcutta, Aug. 21, 1827. -With the sanction of government, the following relief of the troops will take place at the times and in the order hereafter detailed:

Horse Artillery.

2d troop 3d brigade-from Mecrut to Mhow; to march 15th Oct.

Native Cavalry.

1st L.C .- from Sultanpore (Benares) to Mhow; to march 15th Oct.

6th L.C.-from Muttra to Sultanpore (Benares); to march 15th Oct.

Foot Artillery.

2d comp. 4th bat.—from Benares to Saugor, as soon after reaching Cawnpore as the roads will permit.

3d comp. 3d bat. - from Saugor to Mhow, when relieved by the 2d comp. 4th bot Native Infantry.

2d regt. N. I -from Keitah to Barrackpore; to march 15th Oct.

3d regt. N.I.-from Lucknow to Loodehana; to march 15th Oct.

12th regt. N.I .- from Loodehana to Nussecrabad; to march 15th Oct.

13th regt. N.I.—from Jumalpore, right wing to Allahabad, left wing to Jaunpore; to march 15th Dec.

20th regt. N. I .- from Barrackpore to Keitali; to march 15th Nov.

34th regt. N.I .- from Seetapore to Saugor, when relieved by the 62d N.I.

40th regt. N.I. - from Dinapore to Mynpoorie; to march 1st Nov.

43d regt. N.I .- from Saugor to Benares; on the 1st Nov.

56th regt, N. I .- from Nusseerabad to Lucknow; to march 15th Oct.

62d regt. N.I .- from Benares to Sectapore; to march 15th Oct.

1st Extra N.I. — from Neemuch to Mhow; to march 20th Nov.

3d Extra N.I. - from Mynpoorie to Mhow; to march 15th Oct.

4th Extra N.I., right wing-from Allahabad to Mhow; to march 15th Oct.

4th Extra N.I., left wing-from Jaunpore to Mhow, when relieved left wing 13th regt.

N B. Left wing 2d extra regt. to march on the 8th Oct. from Futteghur, to take the duties of the post of Mynpoorie until relieved by the 40th regt., when it will return to its proper station.

Routes will be furnished to corps at and below Benares from the quarter-master general's office, and to those above that station, including Saugor, Neemuch, and Rajpootanali, by the deputy quarter-master general at Cawnpore.

NEW MEMBER OF COUNCIL.

Fort William, Aug. 24, 1827. — The Hon, the Court of Directors having been pleased to nominate Sir Chas. Theophilus Metcalfe, Bart., to be a provisional mentber of the supreme council of Fort William; Sir Charles Theophilus Metcalfe, Bart, has accordingly this day taken the usual oaths and his scat as a member of the supreme council, under the usual salute from the ramparts of Fort William.

TOUR OF THE COMMANDER-IN-CHIEF.

Head-Quarters, Calcutta, Aug. 28, 1827.
—With the sanction of government, the following officers of the personal staff of his Exc. the Right Hon. the Commander-in-chief, and of the general staff of the army, will proceed by water to Cawnpore, where they will wait the arrival of his Exc., who intends to follow, by dawk, on a tour of inspection in the Upper Provinces about the beginning of November next.

Lieut. Col. the Hon. J. Finch, C.B., military secretary to the Commander-m-chief.

ecretary to the Commander-m-chief.

Capt. T. Macan, Persian interpreter.

Lieut. Col. F. H. Dawkins, Capt. E. C. Archer, Capt. G. C. Mundy, and Lieut. C. Cotton, aidesde-camp.

Lieut. R. F. Dougan and Capt. W. H. Agnew, extra aides-de-camp.

Assist. Surg. Murray, 16th Lancers. Lieut. Col. Macdonald, K.H., adj. gen. of H.

M.'s forces.

Col. W. Cotton, C.B., officiating qu. mast. gen.

W. A. Burke, M.D., inspector of hospitals.

Lieut. Col. Com. R. Stevenson, C.B., quart.
master gen. of the army.

maj. W. S. Beutson, dep. adj. gen. of ditto. Capt. J. J. Hamilton, assist, adj. gen. of ditto. Lieut. Col. R. H. Cunliffe, commissary general. Lieut. Col. J. Bryant, judge advocate general.

Capt. T. Bolton, 69th N.I., is appointed to the command of his Lordship's escort, and will also proceed by water to Cawnpore.

WILFUL PERJURY OF NATIVE OFFICERS.

Head-Quarters, Calcutta, S pt. 1, 1827. The Commander-in-chief, on perusing the proceedings of the native general court-martial assembled at Barrackpore on the 30th of May last, bas remarked, with deep concern, that the depositions delivered on oath before that tribunal by Subadar Bowany Sing and Jemadar Hurnaum Sing, of the Orissa Provincial Battalion, are most essentially and materially different from their evidence before a court of inquiry, previously assembled to investigate the same circumstances, and adverting to the explanation of the palpable discrepance afforded by the former, that "that day I had not the Ganges water given to me," and to the latter's having committed wilful and palpable perjury, by declaring that the evidence he then gave on oath was strictly the same as delivered by him to the court of inquiry, considers their conduct so disgraceful to them as officers, as to render them unworthy of being retained in the army, and directs that they be both struck off the strength of the Orissa Provincial Battalion, on the date of this order being published at Ballasore.

Lord Combermers having thus performed an act of imporative justice to the army, explicitly avows his determination to weed its ranks of all such native officers as, under any circumstances, deviate from strict veracity, or seek to attain their object by means of prevarication, falsehood, or perjury.

Officers commanding regiments are directed to have this order explained to their men, so that the retributive justice which has overtaken Subadar Bowany Sing and Jemadar Hurnaum Sing, may serve as a beacon to warn others from a course which, if pursued, must inevitably involve them in a similar fate.

COMPLAINTS AGAINST LIEUT. COL. GARDNER,

Head-Quarters, Calcutta, Sept. 10, 1827. The Commander-in-chief having received various petitions from Mahomed Ally, late a duffadar in the 2d Local Horse, and other individuals of that corps, deemed it an act of impartial justice to submit the complaints therein preferred against Lieut. Col. Gardner to the investigation of a special court of inquiry; and having now received and perused the whole of the proceedings, has much gratification in publishing to the army, that the result of a close and rigorous investigation has proved highly creditable to that officer, as it has incontestably established that the system of interior economy, which obtains in the 2d Local Horse, is of the highest order, and that the respective rights of individuals are secured to them, in a manner calculated alike to promote their own welfare, and to improve the efficiency of the corps.

Lord Combernere fully appreciates the anxious and painful situation in which Lieut. Col. Gardner was placed, when called on to refute accusations so deeply involving the respectability of his character, and trusts that his harassed feelings will now be assuaged by this unqualified approval of every part of his conduct which came under the revision of this Special Court of Inquiry.

The professional zeal, ardour, and ability, with which Lieut. Col. Gardner has endeavoured to promote the comfort, happiness, and prosperity of every member of his corps, are freely acknowledged; and Lord Combermere is convinced, that he is only acting in unison with the feelings of every respectable individual of that regiment, in directing the dismissal from the service of those, whose base ingratitude to their chief renders them unworthy of being longer associated with their quondam comrades in arms; and, in execution of this decision, directs that on the promulgation of this order at Khasgunge, Meer Bahadur Ally, Meer Rustum Ally, resaldars; Shaick Shabool Deen, resaeidar; Delail Khan, naib resaldar; and Shaick Emaum Buckhe, jemadar : be instantly paid up, and discharged from the service.

COURT MARTIAL.

ENSIGN THELOH

Head Quarters, Sept. 17, 1827 .- At a General Court-Martial assembled in Fort William, on Thursday the 6th day of Sept. 1827, Ensign Tulloh, of H. M.'s 14th legt., was arraigned upon the undermentioned charges :

1st. For having, in Fort William, on the evening of the 11th Aug. 1827, when informed by the sentry at the Calcutta gate that the gate through which he wished to pass was not a passage, got out of his buggy and struck the sentry; and, on the running sentry approaching to the assistance of his comrade, having also struck the running sentry.

2d. For having, on the native commissioned officer commanding the guard coming up and remonstrating with him, also struck the said officer.

Such conduct, or any part of it, being disgraceful to the character of an officer, and in breach of good order and military discipline

Upon which charges the court came to the following decision:

Finding .- The court, from the evidence before them, find the prisoner, Ensign Tulloh, of H. M.'s 14th regt. of foot,

I pon the 1st charge, guilty. Upon the 2d charge, guilty.

Sentence - The court adjudge Ensign Tulloh, of H.M.'s 14th regt. of foot, to be dismissed from H.M.'s service.

Approved and confirmed, (Signed) Comberners, General,

Commander-in-chief. Remarks by the Right Hon, the Commander-in-chief. The Commander-in-chief trusts that the example which he has now been compelled to make, may serve as a warning to others. It is the imperative duty of an officer to support, to the utmost of his power, the character of a soldier placed as a sentinel, more especially if belonging to the native army, the men of which are, from a mistaken idea of respect, too prone to be remiss in the execution of their orders when opposed by an European. His lordship reprehension. Mr. Tulloh will be struck off the strength of the army from the day on which this order may be made known to him, and placed under charge of the town major for the purpose of being sent to England.

must, however, observe that such violation of discipline as has now been brought to notice, will ever meet with his severest

The foregoing order is to be entered in the G. O. book, and read at the head of every regiment in H.M.'s service in India. By order of the Commander-in-chief,

A. MACDONALD, Adj. Gen. of H.M.'s army in India.

CIVIL APPOINTMENTS.

Territorial Department.

Aug. 30. Mr. R. Loughman, a junior assistant to agent of governor-general in Sagur and Nerbudda territories.

Sept. 20. Mr. George Swinton, officiating secre-tary to government.

Mr. Edmund Molony, officiating secretary to government in general department.

MILITARY APPOINTMENTS. PROMOTIONS, &c.

Fort William, Aug. 13, 1827.—Lieut. F. Grote, regt. of artil., to be a supernum, aide-de-camp on personal staff of Governor general, from 22d July. Mr. D. Woodburn admitted on establishment as an assist. surgeon.

Aug. 14.—18th N.I. Ens. C. Brown to be lieut. from 26th July 1827, v. Jenkins dec.

trom 20th July 1827, v. Jenkins dec.
Officers promoted to rank of Capt. by Brevet.
1st Lieut. T. Sandere, of artillery, from 4th Aug.
1827; 1st-Lieut. R. K. Kemp, of ditto, from 5th
Aug. 1827; 1st-Lieut. G. Twenlow, of ditto, from 6th Aug. 1827; 1.Leut. W. R. L. Falthful, of 4'd
N. L., from 6th Aug. 1827; Lieut. P. C. Anderson, of 64th N. L., from 8th Aug. 1827.

Mr. T. L. Harington admitted on establishment as a cadet of cavalry.

as a cance of cavary.

Ang. 17.—Licut. Dickson, of engineers, to be executive engineer of 16th or Purneah division of public works, v. Sanders compelled from dangerous illness to leave his station.

M. C. Turner admitted on establishment as a veterinary surgeon.

Assist, Surg. C. C. Egerton, oculist and super-intendent to Eye Infirmary, app. to medical charge of Lower Orphan School, v. Newmarch proceeding to Europe.

Capt. Alex. Gerard, 27th N.I., surveyor in Mal-wah and Rappootanah, removed from that app. and placed at disposal of com-in-thief.

Head-Quarters, Ang. 9.—Lieut. II. Kirke to act as adj. to Sirmoor bat. until arrival of Lieut. Townsend; dated 3d July 1827.

Aug. 10.-Lieut. J. Turton to act as adj. to 2d bat, of artil., as a temporary arrangement; dated 6th Aug. 1827.

2d-Lieut. F. Grote removed from 1st troop 2d-brigade of lieise artil., v. 2d-Lieut. J. Trower, from latter to fermer.

Assist, Surg. Alex. Wardrop (on furlough) posted to 12th N.I.

First William, Aug. 22.—Cadets R. Waller, Z. M. Mallock, and Jas. Brind admitted to artillery, —Cadets W. Carneyg, R. Morriscon, Arch. Cowper, H. P. Welford, W. M. Maule, M. T. Blake, D. Graham, F. Wallace, Jas. Sleeman, Chas. Windsor, and Jos. Chilcott, admitted to infanty, and prom. to ensigns.—Messrs. D. Gullam, And. Wilson, T. T. Morgan, H. H. Spry, Jas. Corbet, and Jas. Stokes admitted as assists. surgeons.—Messrs. R. B. Parry and Wm. Barrett admitted as veterinary surgeon

Aug. 24.—Assist. Surg. John Turner to be surg., v. Mansell retired.

Officers promoted to rank of Capt. by Brevet. Lleut. D. Sheriff, 48th N.I., from 13th Aug. 1826. —Lieut. P. Gerard, 9th N.I., from 19th Aug.

Head-Quarters, Aug. 15.—Lieut. C. Norgate to act as adj. to 18th N.l., during absence of Lieut. Anson; dated 25th July 1827.

Aug. 20.—Surg. John Henderson (lately prom.) app. to 64th N.I. Aug. 21. Aug. 21.—Licut. J. Stevens to act as interp. and qu. mast. to 6th N.I., during absence, on medical certificate, of Licut. J. H. Clarkson; dated 1st Aug. 1827.

Aug. 22.—1st Europ. Regt. Lieut. Jas. Matthie to be interp. and qu. mast., from 8th May 1827, v. Howard app. to a staff situation.

Aug. 25.—Ens. J. Chilcott removed, at his own request, from 10th to 6th extra N.I.

Lieut. Col. C. W. Hamilton removed from 64th N.I. to lat Europ. Regt., and Lieut. Col. J. Ward, from 1st Europ. Regt. to 64th N.I.

Cadet T. L. Harington app. to do duty with 6th L.C., Sultanpore, Benares Ensigns (secartly prom.) appointed to do duty. H. P. Welford with 67th N.I., at Dinapore; W. M. Maule, 7th do., at Berhampore; W. Carnage, 60th do., at Meerut.

Officiat, Assist. Surg. Hart app. to 52d N.I., at Akyab.

1st-Lieut. C. Grant removed from 1st to 3d troop 1st brig, horse artil., v. 1st-Lieut. F. Brind from latter to former.

Aug. 30.—Surg. John Turner (lately prom.) posted to 5th L.C.

Assist. Surg. Jas. Nisbet app. to do duty with H.M.'s 47th Foot.

Assist, Surg. Jos. Willan directed to place himself under orders of superintend surg. at Cawn-

Ang. 31.—Veterinary Surgs. posted to Corps. R. B. Parry to 1st brig. horse artillery, at Cawnpore; W. Barrett, 6th L.C., at Sultanpore, Benares; C. Turnet to 9th L.C., at Cawnpore.

Capt. G. Boyd, 50th N.I., to act as fort adj. of Aliahabad, during absence of Lieut. Burroughs.

Sept. 1.—Lieut. H. P. Burn to act as interp. and qu.mast. to 1st N.I., during absence of Lieut. Fisher; dated 2d Aug. 1827.

Fort William, Sept. 3.—Offic. Assist. Surg. M'Rae permitted, at his own request, to resign temporary employment in service of Hon. Company.

Sept. 7.—60th N.I. Ens. G. Borradaile to be lieut. from 12th Aug. 1827, v. Van andau dec.

Assist. Surg. Jas. Nisbet app. to medical duties of civil station of Nuddeah, during absence of Assist. Surg. Downes.

Assist. Surg. Downes.

1st. Lleut. T. S. Burt. 1st. Lleut. H. Goodwyn, and 2d. Lieut. P. W. Willis, of corps of engineers, placed at disposal of Military Board, with a view to acquiring practical part of their professional duties in civil and military architecture.

Lieut. White app. to charge of public works at Chittagong, and Capt. Terraneau to those at Comillsh.

Infantry. Major W. L. Watson to be lleut. col., from 3d Sept. 1827, v. Stuart dec.
4th N.I. Ens. D. Wilkie to be lleut, from 22d Aug. 1827, v. Chitty dec.

A34 N.I. Capt. H. G. Maxwell to be maj., Brev. Capt. and Lieut. W. R. L. Faithfull to be capt. of a comp., and Ens. A. F. Macpherson to be heut., from 3d Sept. 1827, in suc. to Watson µrom.

Lieut. Alex. Farquharson, 6th Extra N.I., to be capt. by brevet, from 2d Sept. 1827.

Head-Quarters, Sept. 3. - Assist. Surg. Dallard directed to place himself under orders of supermtend. surg. at Cawnpore.

sent, 4.—Assist, Surg. Walker directed to relieve Offic Assist, Surg. Brown from medical duties of Etawah, and Assist, Surg. Moriected do duty with 1st brig. horse artil, in room of Assist. Surg. Walker; dated 16th Aug.

Ens. Jas. Sleeman removed, at his own request from 46th N.I. to 5th Extra Regt. at Jubbulpore.

Lieut. Box, 1st Europ. Regt., to act as adj. to that corps. as a temporary arrangement; dated 30th June 1827.

Fort William, Sept. 13.—Corps of Engineers. 2d-Lleut. P. W. Willis to be 1st-lleut. from 31st Aug. 1827, v. Dickson dec.

Assist. Surg. A. Wood to be surg., from 17th Aug., v. Stephens dec.

Lieut. B. Stewart, 3d Extra N.I., struck off strength of army from 13th Sept. 1827, under in-structions received from Hon. Court of Directors

Head-Quarters, Sept. 6.—Capt. A. Gerard, 27th N.I., directed to join his regiment at Benares. Lieut. Hunter, 53d N.I., to officiate as adi.

dated 12th Aug. Sept. 10.—Lieut. J. P. Farquharson, 8th N.I., to act as adj. to Cawnpore Prov. Bat., vacant by death of Lieut. Chitty; dated 24th Aug.

Assist. Surgs. A. Wilson and H. H. Spry app. to do duty with artillery at Dum.

Fort William, Sept. 13.—Lieut. John Finnis, 51st N.I., to be an assistant to executive officer of 14th or Saugor div. of department of public works.

Sept. 21.—11th N.I. Lieut. and Brev. Capt. Jas Crondace to be capt. of a comp., and Ens. Wm. Cumberland to be licut., from 8th Sept. 1827, in suc, to Houlton dec.

34 Extra N.I. Ens. W. D. Littlejohn to be licut., from 13th Sept. 1827, v. Stewart struck off. Cadets of artillery R. Waller, Jas. Brind, and W. H. Humfrey to be 2d-licuts.

Regt. of Artil. 2d-Lieut. W. S. Pillans to be 1st-lieut., from 3d Sept. 1827, v. E. Blake dec.

20th N. I. Ens. R. II. Scale to be lieut., from 2d Sept. 1827, v. Douglas dec. 52d N.I. Ens. W. Martin to be be lieut., from 13th Sept. 1827, v. Stapleton dec.

Head-Quarters, Sept. 11.—Lieut. and Adj. Woodburn to officiate as interp. and qu. mast of 4th N.I., during indisposition of Lieut. Wemyss.

Lieut. C. Douglas, 14th N.I., to be 2d in command of Rungpore Light Infantry, v. Vansandau Sept. 17.—Lieut. Cox, 62d N.I., to officiate as adj. to Benares Prov. Bat.; dated 5th Sept.

Officers returned to duty, from Europe. Capt. C. Pearce, 29th N.I.; arrived 6th Aug. 1827.—1st-Lleut. G. 11. Dyke, of artil.; arrived ditto.— Lleut. Jos. Whiteford, 65th N.I.; arrived 13th

HIS MAJESTY'S FORCES.

Aug.

Head-Quarters, Aug. 1, 1827.—Lieut. J. G. Beavan, 54th F., to be capt. by brevet, in East-Indes only.

Aug. 13. Lleut. W. White, 11th L. Dr., to be capt. by brevet in East-Indies only.

Ang. 21.—Licut. R. C. Campbell, 31st N.I., and Licut. A. Grueber, ditto, to be capts, by brevet in East-Indies only.

Scpt. 4.—Until his Majesty's pleasure is known, Capt. S. Cotton, 3d (Buffs), to be dep. qu. mast-gen. to H.M.'s army in India, with rank of ma-in army, v. Lient. Col. Read dec.—Brev. Maj. Cotton app. to Madras presidency.

Sept. 18.—Lieut. T. G. Twigg. 89th F., to be capt. by brevet in East-Indies only.

FURLOUGHS.

FURLOUGHS.

To Europe.—Aug., 13. Assist. Surg. H. Nermarch, for health.—Lieut. Col. F. Sackville, 41st N.I., for health.—Lieut. Col. F. Sackville, 41st N.I., for health (already at Cape of Good Hope.—Capt. Thos. Blair. of artil., for health.—21. Lleut. Col. J. W. Fast, 24th N.I., on prusa flairs.—25. Lieut. O. Lomer, 21st N.I., for health.—Surg. E. Muston, on private affairs.—Sept. of Leut. J. Bartheman, 44th N.I., for health.—Ibut. J. F. Douglas, 49th N.I., for health.—13. Lieut. P. Jackson, regt. of artil.—19. Ens. Thos. M.Mahon, 41st N.I., for health.

mon, 418 N.J., 107 neath.

To Bombay.—Aug. 24. Maj. Gen. Sir Thos. Reynell, commanding Meerut division, for five months (eventually to Europe).—Assist. Surg. Jas. Godon, acting at Indore Residency, for three months, preparatory to applying for furlough to Europe.

The Complete Condition.

To Cape of Good Hope.—Capt. H. E. Page, Invalid estab., for twelve months, for health.—Sept. 7. Capt. R. Stewart, 61st N.I., for health (also to St. Helena, and eventually to Europe).

To Penang. — Aug. 31. Assist. Surg. E. T. Downes, attached to civil station of Nuddeah, for four months, on private affairs (also to Singa-

To Sea.—Aug. 24. Assist. Surg. H. P. Bell, 2d assist. gar. surg., for two months, for health.

HIS MAJESTY'S FORCES.

To Europe.—Aug. I. Capt. and Brev. Maj. Lynch, 30th F., for health.—Capt. Triphook, 50th F., for health.—Bleut. Sykes, 45th F., for health.—Bleut. Sykes, 45th F., for health.—Gleut. Syles, 93th F., for health.—Capt. McGregor, 46th F., for health.—Capt. Macdonald, 1st Foot, on private affairs.—Lieut. Macdonald, 1st Foot, on private affairs.—Lieut. and Brev. Capt. Briscoe, 41st F., for purpose of retingon h.p.—4. Col. Hamilton, 30th F., for health.—Lieut. Brownigg, 13th F., on ditto.—18. Lieut. Srange, 13th L. Dr., for health.—Lieut. Forbes, 19th F., for health.—Ens. Layard, 89th F., for health.—Ens. Layard, 89th F., for health.—Ens.

To Sea.—Aug. 13. Capt. Jacob, 44th F., for one year, for health.

MISCELLANEOUS.

THE LATE MARQUESS OF HASTINGS.

(From a Correspondent.) In our numbers for January and February last, we inserted from the Bengal papers reports of proceedings held at Calcutta, concerning a monument to the memory of the late Marquess of Hastings, and we had hoped enow to have found a transcript of these proceedings transmitted to this country to afford an opportunity to all who might be so disposed, to participate in that honourable testimony.

Further meetings, having the same object in view, were intended to be held in other parts of India. In the mean time, a fact has been communicated to us, which we have much pleasure in giving publicity to in Europe. When the King of Oude heard of the death of Lord Hastings, his Majesty proclaimed a ceremonial of mourning to be observed by all his court, in testimony of regret and respect for his Lordship. This is indeed a noble trait of generous sympathy and disinterested homage to his Lordship's character on the part of an oriental sovereign; and in a country where the transcendent talents of the late Marquess could be so well appreciated, where many years of his valuable life were most zealously devoted to promote the welfare and improve the condition of the mighty empire committed to his charge, thereby exalting the character of his king and country in those distant regions.

Such a fact reflects mutual honour, and is well worthy of record, not only as an incitement to others, but also to afford to his Lordship's sorrowing friends the grateful reflection arising from the contrast which it affords to the ungracious neglect, not to say contumely, which Lord Hastings experienced on his return to Europe; and which, it is feared, may, at the last, have given rise to feelings like those ascribed to Scipio Africanus, in the exclamation of "ungrateful Romans, my very bones shall not rest among you!"

THE GOVERNOR GENERAL.

The Right Hon, the Governor-general left Mecrut on the 4th August, and after a rapid journey from Ghoromuktesir, landed at Futtyghur on the 7th, and took up his residence at Mr. C. T. Middleton's, judge and magistrate. His Lordship had arrived at Bankipore (Patna) on the 16th September. The party will drop down to the Presidency by easy stages, with occasional halts, so as to arrive at Calcutta about the first week of October, and avoid its disagreeable September heats.

The reception of the Governor-general at Mecrut, the Calcutta papers state, was splendid. Lord Amherst expressed himself highly gratified by the manner in which the society of Mecrut have shown the satisfaction they have derived from his residence amongst them.

THE ADJUTANT GENERALSHIP.

We learn that our Adjutant General, Major Watson, is about to resign and proceed to England. The army will lose, by his resignation, the service of one of the most valuable officers on the Bengal staff, and this society an universally esteemed member.—Ben. Chron., Aug. 23.

Our military readers are aware that a change will soon occur in the adjutant-generalship of the army, owing to the retirement of the much esteemed individual who at present holds the appointment.

Several reports have reached us on the subject of the succession to the situation, but we did not like to notice them until we felt somewhat certain upon the subject.

Accounts from the Upper Provinces seem to confirm the most prevalent of our Calcutta on dits, regarding the adjutant-generalship having been offered to, and accepted by Col. Christopher Fagan, commanding the toops in Rajpootana, and the near relative, we believe, of Col. George Hickson Fagan, whose eminent career in the same high situation has been, and we doubt not will long continue to be, a theme of general praise with all those who are competent judges of the subject.—India Gaz., Sept. 27.

LETTERS OF BISHOP HEBER.

The editor of the Calcutta Government Gazette has bestowed some remarks upon the letters of Bishop Heber, which were published in the Quarterly Review, and re-published in the Assatic Journal for April 1826. He considers that these letters, though they display benevolent and liberal feeling, just and comprehensive observation, playful and lively fancy, and sound and refined taste, were written under the impression of the moment, and were never intended for publication. Some of the notions, cursorily formed and imparted upon the first glance, will, he observes, as coming coming from him, be received as authority, whether right or wrong, and may, occasionally, lead to the same inaccurate conclusions respecting Iudia, which spring up with such rank and rapid pertinacity both at home and here, and would choke, if they could, the harvest that has been sown by sound experience and prudent anticipation.

The editor observes, in regard to the character of the Hindus:-" Nothing is more true or does more credit to the late Bishop's observation than the remark that it is idle to ascribe uniformity of character to the inhabitants of a country so extensive as India, subdivided by so many almost impassable tracts of mountain and jungle, and who, as he remarks, 'differ as widely from each other as the French and Portuguese from the Greeks, and Germans, and Poles;' yet he falls into a similar error, and gives an unfavourable picture of the Hindu character in the gross, which, however correct it may be, as applied to a numerous portion of the population, he had had no means of knowing to be equally accurate as applicable to the nations he had not visited, or the tribes with whom he had never held any intercourse. Now, even as relating to those natives amongst whom he had lived, and whose society he encouraged with most exemplary and amiable solicitude, he could not, of his own knewledge, have averred what he has thus generally stated, as it was impossible for him to have had an opportunity of observing the licentiousness of their ordinary and familiar conversation. This, and several other disadvantageous imputations are clearly mere repetitions of the statements of unnamed individuals, upon whose credit, and not Bishop Heber's, rests their accuracy. We are quite confident, however, that they would not have passed into public notice with his sanction upon such authority alone, and we much doubt whether they would nave had his concurrence upon further and graver inquiry."

"The conclusions of the Bishop," he continues, " with regard to the ancient architectural remains of India, are tolerably correct, as far as they are limited to what he had seen at the time he wrote; the structures along the Ganges. These, of course, are subsequent to the periods of Mohammedan intolerance, and throw no light on the remote condition of the Hindus: the principal temple at Benares, to which he alludes, pretends to no antiquity, and was the work of Ahalya Baee, the Mahratta princess. The cavern temples of Ellora and Elephanta he had not visited; but the temples of Southern India, he admits, are larger and more beautiful than those of Upper Hindustan. The antiquity of these, however, is in few instances asserted to be great, at least as they at present exist, and the names and dates of the princes who have repaired and rebuilt them, are, in many cases, preserv. ed, and are subsequent to the tenth century. We cannot, however, admit with Mill, ' that the Hindus took all their ideas of magnificence from their Mohammedan conquerors, as the two styles of archi-tecture are distinctly marked, and differ as widely as Grecian and Gothic, Pointed or dropping arches, lofty and light gate. ways, vaulted cupolas, and slender minarets, constitute the peculiar features of Mohammedan architecture; whilst massive fantastic columns, polyangular towers, pyramidal gateways, great solidity in the outline, and extreme minuteness in the decorations, characterise the architecture of the Hindus. It is impossible to conceive any two edifices so strongly contrasted as the shrine of Visweswara at Benares, and the Taj at Agra.'

As a proof that the opinions of the Bishop were adopted on a superficial view of things, and upon incorrect information, the editor points out a remarkable instance of inaccuracy, in a matter completely and peculiarly within the scope of the Bishop's personal observation:

"The Bishop observes, when speaking of native education: 'although for the college in Calcutta (not Bishop's College remember, but the Vidyalaya, or Hindoo College) an expensive set of instruments has been sent out, and it seems intended that the natural sciences should be studied there, the managers of the present institution take care that their boys should have as little time as possible for such pursuits, by requiring from them all, without exception, a laborious study of Sanscrit, and all the useless, and worse than useless, literature of their ancestors.' Could it be thought possible that this statement is wholly unfounded? that so far from the managers of the Vidyalaya ever interfering to prevent the study of English, the institution was founded expressly to teach English, and that English is the great aim and object of the college; and so far from their requiring from all the students, without exception, to study Sanscrit, there never were above three or four boys out of the whole school engaged in that study along with their English lessons, and their acquirement of Sanscrit was merely elementary, as introductory to the knowledge of their own language, for which it has been finally superseded, 50 that at present there is not a Sanscrit class at all? The philosophical apparatus alluded to has been applied to the uses for which it was sent out, and for which it was always designed, and a number of scholars have been reared in the facts of natural and experimental philosophy to an extent very rarely paralleled at home: these things are no secret. Annual examinations have been held publicly for several years past, and for the last four or five years a report of them has been given in the Calcutta journals. The source of the Bishop's mistake is very clear. He has confounded two different institutions, and blended the Sanscrit college with the Vidyalaya, although their objects are perfectly distinct; and whilst the latter was in full operation, the former was scarcely commenced. It is evident, therefore, that of neither did he speak from personal knowledge, and that, notwithstanding the facilities of observation in these cases, he had not corrected nor verified what he had been told, by visiting the establishments, or conversing with any of the managers theniselves as to what they had done or what they proposed to do. Had he been writing for the public-nay, had his valuable life been spared, he would have made or found an opportunity of acquiring very different notions on this subject, as well as on many others, on which his first impressions, thus injudiciously promulgated, are calculated to mislead the public. We must be permitted to think that his friends have acted injudiciously in publishing private letters, written even by him after a short residence in the country, and upon a mere temporary visit to the greater part of the scenes he describes. As private communications, they are admirable; but they cannot be considered-the writer never intended that they should be considered-as infallible guides to the due appreciation of India or the Hindus."

The John Bull of August 16 has the following reflections upon this subject: "The letters from which extracts are given, were obviously never intended for publication by the writer himself; and it is a book-making trick, not very worthy of such a work as the Quarterly, to have devoted them to the ends they are made to serve. It is true, that nothing can come from the pen of so distinguished a scholar as was the late Bishop Heber, which shall not exhibit the man of research and learning-the Christian minister of zeal and sincerity. But Bishop · Heber may, like other men, commit to paper thoughts and opinions, on the first presentation of the objects exciting them to his mind, which a little more mature observation may lead him to correct and qualify. Crude as these thoughts and opinions may be, he would consider them as still within his own breast, although confided to that of a friend: but we are quite sure, that even before the late worthy and highly esteemed Bishop closed his career, the views which the Quarterly exhibits him as entertaining, in regard to the native character and habits, were most materially modified. No one who had the honour of knowing Bishop Heber, and his eminently amiable and courteous manners, and of Asiatic Journ. Vol.25. No.147.

observing the advances which his truly good disposition led him to make to natives of rank, when introduced to him, and who, at the same time, is acquainted with the native character itself, will hesitate to agree with us, that Bishop Heber was not the best judge of this characterand that few men were more liable to be led astray, by the goodness of his own heart, in estimating the real value of ap-pearances around him. The part of his letters quoted by the Quarterly Review confirm this assertion in the strongest manner; and we are persuaded, that there is not a friend of Dr. Heber in India, who is acquainted with the real state of the natives and their character, who will not regret to see from his pen, strictures on these subjects so hasty, crude, and inaccurate, as are those given in the Review."

The India Gazette of August 13 also contains some remarks upon these letters:
"From the Asiatic Journal for April we have taken extracts from recently published letters of the late Bishop Heber, which we have no doubt will prove very interesting to our readers.

"They are written in that pleasing lively strain that one friend may be supposed to use towards another. Accordingly impressions are recorded confidentially, which, if the lamented writer had ever contemplated the probability of meeting the public eye, would in all likelihood have undergone considerable revision. As some of these impressions bear rather hardly on the native character, and as the opinions of such a well-informed and excellent man as Bishop Heber will, by all who have never had opportunities of judging for themselves, be considered in the most authoritative light, it ought to be recollected that they are given, not as deliberate and permanently formed opinions, but rather as the impressions of a traveller thrown on paper confidentially for a friend's perusal. A more extended experience of character, and a longer sojourn among the people of India than it pleased Providence to grant, would perhaps have considerably modified some of these cursory remarks. Whenever Bishop Heber had an opportunity of observing for himself, his remarks could not fail to be striking, original, and just; but we suspect that sometimes he received, as all of us do less or more, his impressions of character from the representations of others, who might be prejudiced, and not so competent observers of national customs, where opportunities offered, as he was himself. When we find, for instance, the Bishop reporting the conversa-tion of the inferior classes as being generally of a very licentious and degrading kind, we suspect that he received, what we cannot but consider an erroneous impression, from others; since his own opportu-3 C nities of acquiring such knowledge from personal observation were, as far as we are aware, not many. Indeed, we cannot well imagine any situation where a person of his rank and station could be a listener to such conversation, even supposing that he so thoroughly understood the native languages as to comprehend all that might be said. From justice to the natives we feel bound to say, that so far as we have had opportunities of observing them ourselves, in the particular alluded to, they are far less offending than their equals of Europe."

ROMANTIC INCIDENT.

The Sumbad Kaumudi, a native paper, relates the following curious occurrence: Lately, in the district of Bankora, a thief had made an entrance through the wall into the house of a Brahman. Whilst searching for booty he heard voices, and was about to retreat, when he found the parties close to the spot where he had entered, consisting of the Brahman's wife and her gallant engaged in conversation. The woman complained of the jealousy of her husband, and her lover recommended her to take advantage of his being asleep to murder him, giving her a weapon for the purpose. She objected, however, that if he should wake he might be too strong for her, and urged the gallant to undertake the deed himself, to which he consented. As he advanced to enter the house, the thief, although disposed to make free with the Brahman's property, thought it incumbent on him to protect the Brah-man's life; and as the intended murderer passed the spot where he was secreted, he thrust the instrument with which he had made his way through the wall into the man's belly and killed him: after which he made his escape. The woman, seeing her gallant slain, made an outcry, which brought her husband and the neighbours to the spot, when she accused the former of having committed the murder. He was accordingly secured and tried, and as appearances were strong against him, sentenced to be hanged. From this fate he was again rescued by the heroism of the freebooter, who, on hearing the turn events had taken, gave himself up, and acknowledged his crime. We have not heard what decision was pronounced in the case.

DESERTION AND RECRUITING IN THE BENGAL ARMY.

The Military Repository of Calcutta contains an article upon the above topics, in which the writer contends, that in time of peace it would be politic to allow any sepoy to take his discharge whenever personal inclination, family interests, or private circumstances rendered the measure desirable. The compulsory retention in our service, in time of peace, of any man auxious for his discharge, seems (he observes) a rigid and unnecessary exactment of his bond. The circumstances under which European and native soldiers enlist are so very different, that the service of the Asiatic ought not to be subjected to the rules which exist against the European. Instead of attributing the difficulty of late years, of completing and increasing our regulars, to any numerical inadequacy of our military population. he considers it questionable whether some of the inducements, which formerly led the military population to enter our regular corps, have not ceased to operate. The system of recruiting by battalions of levies, and admitting into the service men of low caste, he considers highly prejudicial; nor does he approve of the close approxi. mation of the sepoy to the European dress and equipment, considering it as not only contrary to his comfort and taste, as well as foreign to his habits, but to be deprecated on the score of expense.

THE LATE MR. STEPHENS.

We have been favoured with some further particulars respecting the assassination of the late Mr. Stephens. The two patans were apprehended on a charge of theft, and the dagger was amongst the articles they were accused of having stolen. They defended their being found in the house where they were taken, by asserting they had gone thither upon the invitation of the wife of the proprietor. Her evidence was accordingly taken, and, agreeably to the usage of the country, she was brought in a covered palankeen to the door of the apartment, where her answers to the questions of the judge where received, without her person being exposed. The attention of the court being accordingly engrossed by the conference at the door, afforded the murderer an opportunity of taking up the dagger, coming behind, and stabbing Mr. Stephens unperceived. Mr. Stephens was immediately The sirishtidar attempted to removed. secure the assassin, and whilst struggling with him, received a sword-cut from his comrade, which wounded him on the head, and he let go his hold. The men then attempted to escape, but were assailed on all sides; one was killed on the spot, and the other died shortly afterwards of his wounds. Great want of activity or courage was exhibited by the nujeeb, who guarded the prisoners and stood near the door of the cutcherry with a drawn sword. -Cal. Gov. Gaz., Sept. 13.

CONCREMATION.

The Samachar Chundrika, a Bengal native paper, contains the following remarks upon the debates at the East-India House on the subject of concremation :-" On the 29th of March of the present English year, in a meeting at the East-India House in England, one Mr. Poynder made a proposal to put a stop to the burn-ing of widows, and it was his wish that authority should be vested in the Bengal Government wholly to abolish that practice. Against this proposal of Mr. Colonel Stanhope observed, Poynder, we need not meddle with the religious practices of the Hindus; this custom has been in vogue among them for a long course of time, and what necessity is there at present for its discontinuance?' Four or five other persons, directors of the meeting, were of the same opinion; two only endeavoured to have the practice abolished, and the subject was therefore postponed, to be considered at some future meeting. We are divided between joy and regret on hearing this news; we are exceedingly glad that any measures for the discontinuance of concremation were prevented by Colonel Stanhope and other gentlemen of his opinion; and we feel sorrow, that there should be any gentlemen inclined to interfere with a custom which is consonant to our Sastras, and which we have practised for a great length of time without interruption. As we trust that our religious institutes will never be opposed while we are under the subjection of the equitable and glorious King of England, we imagine that the subject of abolishing concremation, which has been now stopped, will not be agitated again,"

The John Bull of Aug. 22 remarks upon the aforegoing :- " Every one must applaud the humane and benevolent motives which have induced Mr. Buxton, Mr. Poynder, and others to come forward in Parliament, and in the court of India proprietors, with an endeavour to put a stop, if possible, to one of the most shocking rites that ever outraged humanitythat of burning the living widow on the funeral pile of her dead husband; and every one possessed of a single spark of feeling in his breast must desire that it were within the power of the local government to abolish at once a custom so cruel and degrading. It is not, however, doing justice to the anxiety which government has shewn, in common with every humane and benevolent individual, that this practice were exploded, to infer from its continuance, that this anxiety is but lukewarm. Such conclusions, we observe, are drawn at home, by several who advocate measures, in the practicability or consequences of which they are yet to be instructed. They are persuaded, indeed, by those to whom truth is indifferent where a desired object is to be attained, that the natives of this country are themselves calling out for an abolition of the suttee; and the authority of the late Marquess of Hasting is quoted to prove that it is fear of public sentiment in England, not in India, that prevents "a consummation, so devoutly to be wished," from taking place. We readily allow that several of the most enlightened and respectable of the natives have declared themselves hostile to the practice, and have even given it as their opinion, that it might be abolished at once by an act of government. But the experiment must still be regarded as important in the eye of government, when in opposition to this opinion of sensible and enlightened minds, there are marshal. led the prejudices of the great mass of the Hindu population. That those prejudices have not been overcome, to the extent contended for, we might infer from the very fact of the suttee being still permitted under our government; but it is now unfortunately established more and more to our satisfaction, by the remarks which Mr. Poynder's motion has called forth from the Samachar Chundrika. These remarks proclaim the joy of the editor; and, it may be presumed, he speaks the sentiments of a goodly portion of the native population, that Colonel Stanhope should have opposed the abolition of the suttee with success, and his regret that Mr. Poynder or any other gentleman should think it necessary to interfere with a custom consonant to the Sastras; concluding with the expression of a hope that ' the subject of abolishing concremation, which has now been stopped,' will not again be agitated; and adding to this hope another-that under the equitable and glorious King of England the religious institutes of the Hindoos will never be opposed.' In these remarks of the Samachar Chundrika the main point at issue is indeed taken for granted, and the suttee is held to be a 'religious insti-tute' sanctioned by the Sastras. This doctrine has been ably impugned by Ram Mohun Roy and others, and the practice of concremation, we certainly think, has been stript of the sauctity which the Brahmins have been attempting to throw around it, as taught in their sacred books. But the question for a government to look to is, in what light it is regarded by the great mass of the people, how an attempt to abolish it would be looked upon by them, and what consequences would follow a direct departure from the policy hitherto pursued, of respecting the religious rites of the na-

BENGAL CLUB.

The rooms of this institution are now, we understand, regularly open to the members, under a set of rules framed for the purpose, and fixing the rates at which breakfast and dinner are provided, and other matters of internal economy. A supply supply of all the latest periodicals, and the London and Indian newspapers, is to be seen in the reading room, and to a limited extent accommodations are prepared for the temporary residence of members from the Mofussil visiting the presidency.—Cal. Gov. Gax., Aug. 20.

NATIVE PAPERS.

Runject Sing.—On the 30th June the son of Yar Mahomed Khan, late ruler of Peshawer, having an audience of the Maharaja, presented a nuzzurana of two laks of rupees, begging his father's restoration to his former authority, and promised himself regularly to attend at the durbar, and prevent any future disturbances at Peshawer. The Maharaja assured him in his hopes, and was pleased to direct that his prayer would be duly attended to.

In consequence of the indisposition of the rance, his Highness returned to Lahore on the 20th of July. On the 22d the governor of Guzerat sent his complaint against the zemindars of Rampoora and other places, for their having given shelter to some robbers who had plundered some merchants of their goods; wherefore a detachment of horse was ordered to be despatched for apprehending them. The governor of Cashmir sent some officers of the valley of Peer Punchal, under a guard of sepoys, charged with embezzlement of public treasure with which they were entrusted. On the 25th two French officers having had an audience, related the particulars of recruits. His Highness conferred on them jewels, garlands of pearls, &c, and, besides the allowance they receive, the district of Chitpoora was granted them by way of jageer, on an annual revenue of 25,000 rupces, together with a piece of ground situated near the monument of Jehangheer, for the purpose of building their house.

The cholera having become alarmingly prevalent at Lahore, the Maharaja moved out across the Ravi, and pitched his tents near the garden of Kutteb Khan. The people were assiduously engaged in acts of devotion and charity, in order to get rid of the malady. At Amritsir the rivers had risen and inundated the country, so that the road was impassable in different places. On one occasion Mohun Sinh, the son of the Dewan of Cashmir, offered 20,000 rupees as nuzzarana, for his father's continuance in office; but was told the dewan must first settle his former accounts before any present payment could be received. This, he replied, could be done when the demand was adjusted, for which he was referred to the proper officers. The agent of the kiladar of Mungreh reported that his master had succeded in taking a robber chief, who had long devastated his distriet, and waited orders for his disposal. He was desired to hang him on the high road, and keep the borses he had also taken as a recompense for his activity. Orders were sent to the governor of Atest to ascertain the movements of Maulavi. Ismaiel, and to suppress any insurrectionary assemblage with the forces at hand, and, if necessary, with the aid of the newly disciplined battalions; but he was to loso no time in sending information to the Raja.

Maulavi Ismaiel.—From Peshawer advices have been received, that about 40,000 of the followers of the Maulavi had assembled in Dereh Jungul, to whom Ata Mohammed Khan, of Caubul, had sent a leader, with a promise to pay the expenses of the war, and it was reported that they would soon advance from that place.

A report was brought by Mohun Sinh to Maharaja Runjit that the Maulavi, after committing devastations in Khairabad, had proceeded to Majahid, from whence he proposed marching to Jelahad. On the 11th of July the hakem of Khairabad sent word that he had despatched a force against the followers of the Maulavi, who had completely surprised them, killed several, and dispersed the rest, Peshawer. — Intelligences from this quarter state, that the governor of this place is, as usual, busy in public transactions. He had sent a detachment of 1,000 horse to suppress a disturbance at Jelalabad. The commandant of Choupani sent a verbal message to the governor, representing that the civil officers of Yar Mahomed Khan had sued to pay a nuzzurana of 25,000 rupees in order to obtain their release.

Janukee Rao Sindia. -- Advices from Gwalior of the 21st July state that the overseer of the toshuckhana of the Maharaja had eloped with a sum of about 12,000 rupees, and his Highness gave orders to apprehend him with all possible expedition. Scarcity of rain, and the locusts, which poured down in that part of the country this year, have destroyed all verdure, and the corn-fields were a scene of deserts; the farmers, apprehending the bare prospect of their success this year, were daily quitting their respective villages. His Highness offered them many comforts, and promised a remission of revenue. The political agent came, and much conversation took place with him about the administration of state affairs and on other subjects; after which he took leave.

Shahjehanabad.—On the 1st of August his Majesty held a court in the Dewan Khas, when Sir Edward Colebrooke, Mr.

Mr. Sutherland, Mr. Grant, and Dr. Ludlow, and many Hindustani sirdars; were present; and the former presented a letter from the Governor-general, as well as presents to the King and heir apparent ! honorary dresses were conferred upon the gentlemen. In the evening vessels of sherbet were sent by his Majesty and the princes (agreeably to the usage of distributing drink at this period). On the 2d( whilst his Majesty was at the Dovecote, Raia Suhan Lall reported that the agent of the heir apparent had been with the resident, to solicit permission for Mirza Nur Bukhsh to set up a standard, but was told that it was not customary; the Mirza had replied, it was equally contrary to rule to erect a tazia (a temporary mausoleum) in the Muhal; upon which his petition was complied with.

Januar .- On the 28th of June the Dowager Bai and young Raja with their attendants proceeded to Amir. They travelled in a sort of carriage called indra viman, and were accompanied by the Mohunt Sivanand, with the images of On the 30th Sita and Ram on elephants. they encamped at the temple of Jembur n, being met every where on the road by the people of the towns and villages with demonstrations of rejoicing. On the 1st of July the ceremony of tonsure was performed in the temple; presents were made to the shrine, to religious characters, and the poor; and the raja was permitted to see the image of Jemhur, and partook of the prasad; after which the party returned to Jaypur. On the 2d the Raja entered the city in state, mounted on an elephant attended by his train, and the streets being lined with spectators. On arriving at the palace he was received by the British resident, conducted to his throne, and the usual complimentary gifts were interchanged.

STEAM TUGS IN THE HOOGHLY.

A report has been submitted to the Bengal government, and is now circulating in Calcutta, respecting the introduction of steam-tugs in the river Hooghly. A tabular statement, inserted in the report, exhibiting the number of days occupied by the Company's ships of the two last seasons, 1825 and 1826, in getting out of the river, and the time that would be required to get them to sea, gives the following results, viz. that the saving of time by aid of steam in some cases should be thirty days, in none less than four; and then a statement of the demurrage is added, shewing that the average loss of the Company in the two seasons, or rather the amount that would have been saved had steam-tugs been employed, is Sa. Rs. 22,450.

It is proposed to have steam-pilot vessels of from 160 to eighty-horse power. The report estimates that six vessels would be enough for the whole pilotage of the port, and that the expense would be defrayed if the existing rate for pilotage were quadrupled. This increase seems large: but it is supposed that the demurrage saved to owners would greatly exceed the amount, besides the probable reduction of the premium for insurance, in consideration of the diminution of risk.

APPEAL AGAINST THE REGISTRY OF THE STAMP REGULATION.

The counsel for the petitioners against the registry of the stamp-tax on Tuesday gave notice of appeal against the regulation, in the terms of the 13th Geo. III., cap. 63, sect. 36, which requires that notice of appeal be lodged in the Supreme Court within sixty days after registry. As the counsel had no precedent of such a mode of proceeding, they gave notice of their intention to move in chambers that the registrar be at liberty to receive and file their notice of appeal. This motion was accordingly made on petition signed by all the petitioners. There was no opposition to the motion, which was granted by the Chief Justice, who observed that perhaps there had been an unnecessary degree of caution in giving notice to the Company's attorney. If this were an error, however, it was one on the safe side. and the community must feel that it increases their obligations to their counsel. -Beng. Chron., Sept. 15.

CONCERT.

The private subscription concert, held at the residence of C. Trower, Esq. on Friday evening last, the object of which was a contribution for the benefit of some Europeans in distressed circumstances, was well attended, and went off with spirit. Occasions of this nature are so rare, and performers, both professional and amateur, are so seldom collected in any strength, that it is more extraordinary they should execute any compositions with tolerable accuracy, than that they should fail occasionally in giving that full effect, for which regular and combined practice is essentially requisite. Notwithstanding these obvious causes of diminished efficiency, the performances in both departments were such as to reflect credit on the musical taste and talent of Calcutta. The success of this party, and of a similar one a few months since, are great encourage-ments to the revival of a plan which afforded, some three or four years ago, much gratification to the society of Calcutta, that of conducting a series of subscription concerts at private houses. We should of course much prefer seeing a renewal of public concerts, but as difficulties of an almost insuperable nature are opposed to their success, musical performances on a more private scale form the only alternative offered to the lovers of the art, and the promoters of social and refined amusement.—Cal. Cov. Gax., Aug. 6.

PUBLIC WORKS AND IMPROVEMENTS.

It has frequently been a subject of reproach to England, that she has been indifferent to local improvements in her colonies, and more particularly in India; and there was formerly perhaps some justice in the observation, that were we to leave it, no trace of our ever having been in the country would be discovered. But of late years there has been an evident anxiety to consult public convenience, by the formation of roads and canals, and the erection of bridges. The new Benares road, though not so well constructed as might have been expected, has neverthe. less proved of very great advantage to travellers in the cold and hot weather; and, we trust, means may be found to make it as useful in the rains. No tax is more readily and cheerfully paid by the inhabitants of a country, than that which is appropriated to purposes of the description in question. We understand that the Budge Budge road has been continued to Mayapore, and that a canal with a road attached he been cut from Ouillabarah on the Hoogly to Omptah on the Damoodiah; and that another canal is in contemplation from Burdwan to Naiaserai, between Chinsurah and Suksagor. The facilities which will be thus given to the transport of the produce of Burdwan will be very valuable in a commercial point of view. In Calcutta, the progress of opening and widening streets and digging tanks, though not so rapid as three or four years ago, still continues, and reconciles us in some measure to the moral objections to lotteries, from the funds of which the improvements are made. - Beng. Chron., Aug. 16.

ESCAPE FROM A LION.

We have been favoured by a friend with the particulars of the truly wonderful escape of a gentleman from a lion, while out hunting in the neighburhood of the station of Kurnaul. On the 20th of last May, Baron Osten and a friend, with their attendants, were out hunting, and mounted on elephants, when they fell in with a troop of lions. They succeeded in killing four of them, and were looking for a fifth, which the Baron had badly wounded, when the enraged animal in the first place charged and wounded one of the pad elephants, and then charged the Baron's elephant. Seeing this, the baron leant over the elephant to shoot the lion, when most unfortunately the front part of the howdah gave way, and he fell head foremost over the elephant and upon the lion. The scene at that moment is more easily capable of being imagined than described. The spectators thought that it was all over with the baron, when they saw the lion turning ferociously upon him with his formidable teeth and claws. The odds were indeed fearfully against him, but still, through the mercy of Providence, he escaped from the jaws of the terrible creature, but was severely wounded, having sustained a compound fracture of his left arm, four teeth wounds on the right arm, as also several lacerations inflicted with the animal's claws. He was also wounded on the forehead, besides contusions of his head and different parts of his body. The baron was carried in on a dooly to cantonments, whence the party were about twenty coss distant when the accident happened. He suffered for some time severely from the wounds and fractures, which were exceedingly painful. Altogether it is one of the most miraculous escapes we have ever heard of, and emphatically illustrates the rule of nil desperandum .- India Gaz., Aug. 20.

NATIVE PARTIES.

Such of our friends as have no particular relish for notoriety, should be rather more scrupulous than they have hitherto been in the visits they pay to the native part of the town, and the manner in which they amuse themselves on such occasions. The native papers have begun to appropriate a corner to the news of the beau-monde of Chitpore and Muchwa Bazar, and not having any asterisks or dashes in their typography, are apt to give names and titles at full length. A party at the house of a baboo in Kuburdanga, last week, is thus particularized in the Udanta Martunda, and the reporter seems at a loss which to admire most, the singing and dancing of the English beebees, or of Gunga Bace. We should think the former will not feel much flattered by the comparison .- Gov. Gaz., Aug. 20.

BENGAL MARINERS' FUND.

By a published statement of the affairs of the Bengal Mariners' and General Widows' Fund, it appears that, after paying for the past year pensions in India to the amount of Rupees 42,905, and in England to the amount of Rupees 7,249, there remains a balance in the hands of the directors amounting to Rupees 3,32,551.

FALSE ACCUSATION BY A NATIVE.

The John Bull of August 20 contains a detailed report of a case of prosecution for forgery instituted by a box-wallah against Mr. Clarke, a serjeant of the petty court, with all the previous proceedings in that court. If this report be correct, a more more iniquitous case on the part of the prosecutor never came before a tribunal of justice. It appears that the box-wallah, defeated in his suit in the Court of Requests by the production of receipts, swore that the date of one had been altered, and that the other was altogether a forgery. This charge brought the case before the Supreme Court, and the result has been the establishment of Mr. Clarke's innocence in the most complete and satisfactory manner, and the consequent defeat of a malicious conspiracy, first to defraud, and then to ruin, an honest man. The report of the trial was forwarded by one of the parties.

NAUTICAL INTELLIGENCE.

The Calcutta papers announce the arrival of the brig Sir Francis M'Naghten from Van Diemen's Land, China, and Singapore. The passengers by her from Hobart Town are Dr. R. Tytler, with despatches for government; Mr. G. A. Tytler; and Mr. L. Helmick, assistant apothecary. This vessel has brought intelligence of the foundation of a new colony laid at Port Raffles, on the north coast of New Holland, and of a fort for its protection, named after the Duke of Wellington, on the 18th June, in lat. 11° 40' S., long. 132° 42' E. lat., by Capt. Sterling, of H. M.'s ship Success. The ships Marquis of Lansdowne and Albion were chased by a large fleet of pirate provs off the Twins, in the Straits of Atlas, on the 5th July 1827. The prows were under Dutch colours. The Marquis of Lansdowne, bound from Sydney to Calentta, touched on a newly discovered shoal, off Cape Direction, on the eastern coast of New Holland, on the 8th June; and on the 29th July touched again on a shoal, not laid down in any chart, off Luban Island, in the Straits of Rhio. Got off from both shoals without damage.

CAPT. VAN SANDAU.

It is reported that a Capt. Van Sandau has been shot dead by one of his own sentinels on the Assam frontier. The unfortunate officer was dressed in a white jacket, and in the darkness of the night the superstitious and alarmed sipahi took him for a ghost, and fired his piece with too fatal precision.—Ben. Chron., Sept. 4.

MURDER OF A CHILD.

The Calcutta papers contain particulars of the deliberate murder of a child, a boy about nine years of age, named Beauchamp, by a native, said to be a fakeer, at Howrah, on the 22d July. The victim, a very interesting boy, was quietly proceeding with another child to a Sunday school, held in the chapel at Howrah, on Sunday morning, a little after seven o'clock, when the infuriated native, armed with a bludgeon, rushed upon him. knocked him down by a severe blow on the head, and inflicted other blows upon him, as well as upon his companion, who saved himself by flight. The poor boy was taken to the general hospital, where he died the same evening. The atrocious act was perpetrated in the presence of many natives, who looked on with calm indifference, and did not even assist in taking up the victim after the deed was done. The murderer was secured. On being taken up, he declared that if he had not been caught he would have killed many more. Varying reports are abroad respecting the motive to the crime: some say the criminal refers it to predestination; some to other superstitious feelings; and some allege that the act was committed in revenge for some fancied denial of justice at the police in a complaint against an European.

CHOWRINGHEE THEATRE.

" The Road to Ruin" was on Friday evening enacted at Chowringhee Theatre, to a respectable but not crowded house. The part of Goldfinch introduced an amateur of a sister presidency, whose theatrical fame had been spoken very highly of in the côteries of the drama. A Calcutta is not, emphatically speaking, an applauding audience. It has its favourites; and a stranger must not expect that his entre will be applauded, or that he will receive great encouragement, until he becomes known. Instead of a hearty welcome, therefore, which we should in courtesy bestow, his début was marked by no uncommon effort at applause. Whether or not this apathu had a benumbing effect upon the nerves of the amateur we cannot say; but certes the first scene gave us no extraordinary opinion of his theatrical ability. Like many things, however, he improved upon acquaintance; and we marvel if ever Chowringhee boards boasted of a better Goldfinch than the gentleman in the end proved himself to be. His stature is rather above the middle size, and his person manly and agreeable. He appeared awk-ward in the first scene, and his manner in walking round to exhibit his person was ludicrous, rather than such as to give full effect to his "that's your sort!" His subsequent scenes, however, made up, as we have before hinted, for the defects of the first, and the scene with Milford in the last act, where he describes the arts of jockeyism, both in words and action, was given with a correctness, certainly unparalleled on these boards, perhaps on any other in the present day, and to be equal-led only in the annals of real sporting. The effect was irresistible, and was followed by the loudest applause. We heard it whispered that this was the first attempt in the part of Goldfinch, and this circumstance, if true, would speak greatly in favour of the versatility of theatrical talent possessed by the amateur, if we contrast the characters of Octavian and Skylock, in which we hear he stands unrivalled in India. On the whole, the play was excellently performed, and though the tradesmen were a shocking motley groupe, and the scenery not quite sufficiently attended to, we cannot but be well pleased with the evening's amusement. — John Bull, Sept. 3.

CHANGES IN GOVERNMENT OFFICES.

It is said that Mr. Secretary Lushington positively goes home via Bombay and Egypt in October. Mr. Prinsep, it is reported, will succeed to the vacant office; and his place again, we hear, will be supplied by Mr. Molony until Mr. H. Mackenzie returns to the presidency.—Ben. Chron., Sept. 4.

THE LATE INSURRECTION AGAINST THE

During the late disturbances in the Punjab, which were so soon suppressed by the power and activity of Maharajah Runjit Sinh, no pains were spared to spread an opinion favourable to the cause of the insurgents through the upper and western provinces. As might be supposed, the truth on these occasions was very little regarded; but it can be scarcely conceived to what extent. The bulletins of Buonaparte were miracles of veracity, compared to those of the politicians of Hindustan. The following, which is a summary translation of one of the documents sent into circulation, will shew how well the practice was understood. paper was circulated in Malwa, and must have been issued subsequently to the time at which the combined troops of Yar Mohammed Khan and Syed Ahmed had received their final defeat from the Sikh force under Budh Sinh, which was followed by the immediate pacification of Peshawer and Kabul.

" From the newspapers issued by her Highness Sumroo Begum, the English papers and letters to the Nawab Mir Khan, the following particulars have been collected of the war with the infidels in the north-west: - The pious Syed Ahmed having repaired with four thousand followers to the ruler of Kabul, reproved him for his indifference to the cries of the faithful, who had appealed to heaven against the tyranny of the infidel Sikhs; but the prince urged his incompetence to cope with their force. It fortunately happened, shortly afterwards, that the Sikh ruler of Khairabad committed such exactions on the district of Mir Mohammed Khan that he was obliged to apply for succour to his brother, Yar Mohammed of Peshawer.

That chief, with 7,000 horse and 4,000 foot, marched accordingly to his aid, and was joined by the Hakem of Kabul, with 10,000 horse and 6,000 foot, and by the holy Syed, whom the three princes joy. fully appointed as their leader. The combined army marched towards Khairabad. and encountered a large host of infidels, which they totally defeated, chased into the fortress, and took it. The Syed advanced to the Aba Sind, which river, then swollen unusually high, became fordable at his prayers. He crossed and took Azur, which is seven coss on this side. From thence he proceeded with 7,000 horse and an innumerable host of foot towards La. hore, whilst Maulavi Ismaiel and Maulavi Abdul Hy proceeded in other directions, and 500 men were left in Azur. Budh Sinh, with 5,000 men, evading the principal divisions, fell suddenly upon this little garrison, who resolutely resisted so dis-proportionate a force. They killed 2,500 of the enemy, but were reduced to twelve, when Maulavi Ismaiel, coming to their aid, dispersed the assailants, putting numbers to the sword. Ramsinh, with 12,000 Siklis. attacked the Maulavi, but was defeated with prodigious loss. After this, Kipa Sinh, ruler of Cashmir, with seventeen guns, his family, and followers, joined the Maulavi, and he and his family adopted the Mussulman religion; five companies of the regiment of Roshun Khan, with a number of artillerymen, also joined the Syed. Runjit Sinh then commanded his French officers to march against Peshawer, but they replied, give us a hundred cannon, which Runjit refusing, the Prince Kherg Sinh, with 30,000 horse, ten battalions of foot, and fifty guns, moved out. He encamped within six cos of the army of the faith, which had been joined by Dost Mohammed Khan, Durani, with 12,000 horse, 10,000 foot, and fifty guns. In the engagement that ensued, and which lasted from dawn till evening, Kheig Sinh was totally routed. The army of Islam, amounted at the latest advices, to 50,000 horse and 41,000 foot, and it was expected would soon amount to a lac and a half. The Syed has ordered that two rupees shall be given for every Sikh head, whilst Runjit has promised five rupees for the head of every Mohammedan."-Cal. Gov. Gaz., Aug. 30.

CHANGE IN THE MANAGEMENT OF THE STAMP DUTIES.

The following notification, dated 2d August, has been published by the government:—

Inconvenience having been experienced in the general management of the Calcutta stamp duties, from the distance at which the office of the Board of Revenue in Calcutta is situated from the stamp office, and more especially from the delays incident incident to the necessity of making references to the board before stamps, in certain cases, can be affixed to deeds and instruments sent for the purpose. Right Hon. the Vice-President in Council, by virtue of the powers reserved to government in the 3d section of the regulation for raising and levying stamp duties within the town of Calcutta, passed on the 14th June last, and registered in the Supreme Court on the 12th July following, has been pleased to resolve, that from the 10th day of this month (August) the care and management of the said stamp duties within the town of Calcutta, and the powers and authorities conferred to that end by the said regulation, shall be transferred from the said Board of Revenue of Calcutta, to the Board of Customs. Salt and Opium, or the members thereof for the time being, who have been appointed commissioners for the management of the Calcutta stamp duties, in the manner prescribed in the above cited section of the said regulation.

EARTHQUAKE.

The Delhi akbars of August relate that the fort of Kolitaran had been destroyed by an earthquake, and a thousand persons buried under the ruins. The same convulsion had shivered a mountain in pieces, which falling into the river Rawce, caused the country to be inundated to a distance of 100 coss round. Three thousand workmen were employed in cutting a channel through the mountain, and great apprehension was entertained of the injury likely to be inflicted upon Lahore whenever the river should force its way through the channel. It was computed that no fewer than 30,000 victims had perished from cholera in Amritsir, Lahore, and the camp.

SHIPPING.

Arrivals in the River

Arrivals on the River.

Aug. 25. Minerva, Hurre, from London.—Sept.

1. Bengal, Atkins, from Liverpool.—2. Albion,

M. Lead, from Liverpool: Lady of the Luke, Nilchis, from London; and Abgarris, Smith, from Marritis and Madras.—8. Snapron, Kendall, from Marritis and Madras.—8. Snapron, Kendall, from Madras,—13. Wetwore, Buchanan, from Geenock,
Nine of the Marritiss.—91. Melish,
Nine of the Marritiss.—91. Melish
Madras; and Topac, Hrewster, from Boston, and Madras; and Topac, Hrewster, from Boston, and Madras and Francis Warden, from Bonlay.—24. Divide from London; Criss, Peabody, Yean Liverpool and Francis Warden, from Bonlay.—25. Divide from London; Criss, Peabody,
Yean Liverpool, and Francis Warden, from Bonlay.—26. Divide from London; Criss, Peabody, Yean Liverpool, and Madras; and La
Laus, from Bordeaux.—12. Mennony, Anvery,
Yen Bordeaux.—01. John, Baslis, from Rio.
S. Kira, Sutton, from under and Madras; and La Laus, from Bordeaux.—01. John, Baslis, from Rio.
Repress of Lansiaven, Neyes, Frun N.S. Wales; and Nany, Guizance, froverodeaux.—10. John Margares of Lansiaven, Neyes, Frun N.S. Wales; and Nany, Guizance, froverodeaux.—11. Lady
M Naghten, Fsith,
Assatic Journ., Vol. 25. No. 147.

from London and Madras.—12. L'Alfred, Fornier, from Nantz.—24. Coronizadel, Label, from Bordeaux.—27. Marquess Wellington, Chapman, from London, 30. Can nhrea Castle, Davey, from London; and Princess Charlotte of Wales, Biden, from London and Madras.

Departures from Calcutta.

Departures from Calcutta.

Aug. 22. Guardian, Sutherland, for Mauritius.

—27. David Srott, Thornhill, for Madras and London: Modeline, Coghlian, for Mauritius and London: St. Leonard, Rutherford, for London.—31. Hondony, Lee, for Madras. — Sept. 1. Frances Charlotte. Tailbert, for Mauritius.—9. Crawn, Pinder, for Singapore.—11. Ser William Valleer, William, Irc. London.—15. Indiana, Webster, for Isle of France.—16. Thames, Warming, for London.—24. Ann. Adler, for Mauritius.—25. laukella, Parker, for London; and City of Etinburgh, Mackellar, for Mauritius.—26. Limited of Cort. 16. Milford, Jackson, for Bombay.—20. Simpson, Black, for Mauritius. ford, Jackson for Mauritius.

BIRTHS.

May 24. At Cawnpore, the lady of Lieut, and Ady. Chitty, of a daughter.
July 27. At Loodhandt, the lady of Capt. L. Bruce, 12th regt., of a daughter.
Aug. 5. At Delhi, Mis. J. Gould, of a son, 6. At Saugor (li Mawa), the wife of Mr. C. Turton, of the Commissariat Department, of a daughter.

daughter.
15. At Simla, the lady of Capt. Wm. Turner, fort adı, of Agra, of a daughter.
17. At Futtelpror, the lady of R. Laughton, Esq., assist. surg., of daughter.
18. At Chunar Ghur, Mrs. Jos. Durand, of a daughter.

daughter. The widow of the late Mr. J. Murray, of a 19. Mrs. W. Walker, of a daughter. 20. On the river, near Plassey, the lady of Assist. 20. On the river, near Plassey, the lady of Assist. Surg. Barber, of a daughter.

24. At Kurnaul, the lady of Capt. II. J. Wood, horse artillery, of her fifth son.

— Mrs. Jos. Pyva, of a son and heir.
27. At Allighur, the lady of T. J. Turner, Esq., rivil service, of a daughter.

— At Kumtool factory, Tirhoot, the wife of Mr. Win. Kennedy, of a daughter, 31. At Agra, Mrs. W. Kidd, of a daughter.
Sgd. 2. At Mymunslag, the lady of J. Dimbar, Esq., civil service, of a son.
4. At Neemuch, the lady of Major F. Walker, 65th N.1., of a son.
The lady of Capt. C. Cowles, of a still-born child.

5. Mrs. Gray, wife of Mr. J. Gray, of the Ben-gal Hurkaru printing establishment, of a soil.

— The lady of T. Thomas, Eq., of Madras, of twins.

twins.

Mrs. Ewart, of a daughter.

Mrs. E. H. Grindall, of a son.

The lady of J. Grant, Esq., acting assistant assay master, of a son.

At Dacca, the lady of F. Law, Esq , civil ser-— At Datca, the lady of F. Law, Esq., civil service, of a son.

8. At Luckeepore, near Commercolly, the lady of II. II. Griffiths, Esq., of a daughter.

— Mrs. R. George, of a daughter.

9. At Howrah, Mrs. J. Statham, of a son.

10. At Lucknow, the lady of Geo. Ballile, surgeon to his Majesty of Oude, of a son.

— At Mullye, the lady of Lleut. Col. J. II. Cave, of a daughter.

12. The lady of Wrm. Hawes, Esq., of a son.

13. Mrs. J. J. Fleury, of a daughter.

14. Mrs. Jas. Oglivie, of a daughter.

15. The lady of Lleut. Glasgow, 61st N.I., of a son, still-born.

still-born

18. At Barrackpore, the lady of Capt. A. Shuld-am, dep. assist, adj. gen. pay department, of a ham, dep. assist, adj. gen. pay department, or a daughter.

19. At Garden Reach, the lady of S. G. Palmer, Esq., clvil service, of a daughter.

— The lady of Longueville Clarke, Esq., batrister at law, of a som.

21. The lady of John Lowe, Esq., of a som.

23. Mrs. W. C. Rymer, of a son.

24. The wife of Mr. J. W. Wymss, of the Surveyor General's Office, of a son.

25. Mrs. A. M. D'Souzs, of a son and heir,

MARRIAGES.

Sept. 1. At the Cathedral, Mr. M. I. Mendes to Mrs. J. Praigo. — Mr. T. Pereira to Miss M. Cope. 16. At Futtyghur, Mr. Geo. Tuttle to Miss M.

10. At Futtyghur, Mr. Uso. Jacus C. Hennessey.
17. Mr. W. H. Mapleton to Miss A. Henry.
22. Mr. S. Stevens, mariner, to Miss M. Gomes.
— At St. John's Cathedral, Mr. J. Alexander, of the British Gallery, to Caroline, only daughter of Mr. C. F. McNamars, of the Armenian Phlanthropic Academy.

DEATHS.

May 23. At Bogwangolah, Lieut. H. C. Clerkson, 41st N.I.

June 4. At Cawnpore, the lady of Lleut. and Adj. Chitty.

Aug. 3. At Asseerghur, Lieut. W. F. Barlow, adj. of 23d N.I.

adj. of 23d N.I.

18. At Saugor, theson of Mr. Joseph Burridge,
H.C.'s marine, aged 4 years.
22. At Cawpore, Lieut. and Adj. Chitty, provincial battalion.
26. At Delhil, Mrs. Burnett, lady of Brigadler
Burnett, C.B., in her 37th year.
Sept. 3. At Borlbares factory, district of Rungpore, Capt. J. H. Van Helsdingen, aged 65, many years a commander in the Hon. Danish Asiatic Company's service.

— At Kunnaul. of cholera morbus. the Hon.

— At Kunnaul. of cholera morbus.

— At Kurnaul, of cholera morbus, the Hon. Lieut. Errol Blake, Bengal artillery, brother to Lord Westcourt, and adj. Sirhind division of artillery.

8. Mr. John Botellho, assistant at the General

8. Mr. John Boteino, assistant at the General Post Office, aged 35.

— At Dinapore. Capt. Sam. Houlton, 11th N.I.

— Mrs. Mary Metcalfe, widow of the late Mr.

H. T. Metcalfe, aged 36.

10. At Saugor, Anna Marla, wife of Capt. Wm.

Aldons, 38th N.I., aged 23.

— Mr. J. H. Carrow, aged 23.

11. Eliza Ann, daughter of Mr. W. Paton, aged

6 vears.

11. Eliza Alli, vaugnos.

13. At Chittagong, of bilious fever, Lleut. S. Stapleton, acting adj. 52d N.I.

17. At Barrackpore, Mr. M. P. Dalton, late an assistant in the office of the major of brigade of that place, aged 33.

20. Drowned in returning from Sulkeah to his chip. Cant. Chas. Cowan, aged 36, of the ship.

- At Barrackpore, Lieut. D'Arcy Preston, 65th

21. Mr. G. B. Judah, of the Board of Trade.

aged 27.

— At Dum-Dum, James Andrew Graham, only son of Mr. James Robertson, head schoolmaster 23. At Fort William, Lieut. W. H. Humfrey, of the artillery, aged 18.

24. Master D. A. Powell, aged 14.

Lately, At Barrelly, Mrs. Kempball wife of Mr. Commissary Kempball.

Madras.

GOVERNMENT GENERAL ORDERS.

INSTRUCTIONS TO SHIP SURGEONS.

Fort St. George, April 3, 1827 .- The Hon, the Governor in Council has been pleased to direct that the following extract from a general letter from the Hon, the Court of Directors in the Military Department, under date the 12th July 1826, be published in general orders :-

" A preference should always be given to private ships which have surgeons on their establishment, and it will only be in cases of indispensable necessity that we shall sanction the surgeons of our own establishments to be withdrawn from their duties abroad and sent home in charge of invalids; and when that absolute necessity occurs, some one should be selected for the charge who is coming home on furlough, and whose passage may be paid, but no extra allowance given beyond the sum for each man which is specified in regulations hereafter referred to.

"It not appearing that any instructions are issued for the guidance of surgeons in charge of invalids and time-expired men of our service returning to England on private ships, we have caused to be framed a draft of the instructions which we are of opinion should be furnished to them. A copy is now transmitted to you in the packet for that purpose.

" Instructions.

To Mr. -Ship -, which has been engaged to convey -- in the service of the said Company, or to the Surgeon for the time being, time-expired men, and invalids to England.

That you provide yourself with such books and instruments as are necessary for your practice and the proper discharge of your duty in the station of surgeon on board this ship.

That you furnish the government with a list of such medicines as you may have on board, stating whether you consider the same sufficient for the ship's company and troops, and if not, that you furnish the government with a list of such articles as you may require for the troops for the voyage home.

That such medicines as may be remaining on hand when the ship arrives in England, are to be sent to the Company's Baggage Warehouse, New Street, Bishopsgate Street, London, and a receipt for the same to be obtained, which receipt is to be delivered into the Shipping-office, to be laid before the committee of shipping with your jour-

That you keep a journal of your practices agreeably to the form annexed, writing, day by day, therein the names of the men under your care, their hurts or distempers, their particular symptoms, and the day of their recovery, removal, or death, together with your prescriptions and method of treatment. That you make the necessary entries accordingly, and sign and present the same to the captain at the end of every month, for his signature likewise.

That you extract from your journal the most remarkable cases, and give a regular, separate history of them at the end thereof. That you likewise enter in your journal the method of victualling in the homewardbound passage, and state your observations thereon, together with every occurrence during the course of the voyage which, in your opinion, may have contributed to the health or sickness of the people on board.

That you visit the men under your care at least twice a day, and oftener if their circumstances require it, that none may want due assistance and relief.

That you inform the captain every day of the condition of your patients, especially if any of their distempers are infectious, that they may be separated from the rest.

That as spirits, anti-scorbutics, wine, and other articles are sent on board by the government for the use of the military in the voyage, if you find it absolutely necessary at any time for the sick recruits to be supplied with wine or other necessaries, you are to apply in writing to your commander for the same, entering in the journal such your application, with the particulars received in consequence thereof.

That you do invariably enter in your journal the cases of the sick who may requine wine or other extra comforts, together with the quantities consumed by each person daily.

That when the ship shall have completed her voyage, you insert in your journal, by way of index, a regular return or list of the sick, stating the following particulars:

- 1st. The time of their being taken ill.
- 2d. Their names.
- 3d. Their diseases.
- 4th. The date and manner of the termination of the diseases, whether in recovery or death, or the situation of the sick at the time.

That you make three divisions of the index:

The first, containing the names of those taken ill on the voyage.

The second, of those taken ill in the country, either while in port or in passing from one port to another.

And the third, of those taken ill on the voyage homeward; that you enter their names in the index according to the order of time in which they were taken ill.

That you also, when the ship shall have completed her voyage, insert in your journal a general return of the number of persons who embarked, the number of sick, and the number of those who recovered or died, agreeably to the annexed form of a return of these particulars, which, when filled up, is to be signed by the commander and yourself.

That this journal is to be produced upon your arrival to the physician appointed by the Company for his examination, who is to certify his judgment thereupon, after which the journal is to be left at the Shiping-office, East-India House, to be laid before the committee of shipping, when directions will be given as to the payment of the allowance of 15s. each man landed in England."

CONDUCTORS OF ORDNANCE.

Fort St. George, April 24, 1827 .- The Hon, the Governor in Council is pleased to direct, that one conductor and ten subconductors be added to the present establishment of the ordnance department, to be attached to the arsenal of Fort St. George, for the purpose of being employed on any general duty where their services may be required.

REGIMENTAL RECORDS, &C.

Fort St. George, May 1, 1827 .- Several instances baving lately come to his Exc. the Commander-in-chief's notice of great deficiencies in regimental records and books of instruction, and officers com-manding corps having been unable to account for them, or to state when and where they were lost or destroyed; his Excellency is pleased to direct, that whenever any part of the records or books of instruction of a corps may be lost or destroyed, a court of inquiry shall be immediately assembled to ascertain the cause, and its proceedings transmitted through the regular channel to head-quarters. the event of this order being neglected, officers commanding corps for the time being will be held responsible for all deficiencies at the time they may be discovered.

The books of instruction supplied for the use of officers belonging to corps and departments are to be examined monthly by commanding officers of corps, before making out the returns, and are on no account to be taken away from the corps when officers proceed on leave or sick absent, and commanding officers signing the returns will be held responsible for any losses not duly reported and accounted for.

ORDNANCE STAFF ALLOWANCES.

Fort St. George, May 25, 1827 .- The Hon, the Governor in Council deems it expedient to direct the following modifications of the allowances of the several warrant and non-commissioned officers mentioned underneath.

Pay and Staff Allowances to be drawn in future. Staff Pay and Allow-

Dep. Com. of Ordnance. .....250 Subsistence ... 40 Staff pay . Batta of Lieut. 60 Staff allowance 270

Rupees 310 Rupees 310 Assistant Com. of Ordnance. Staff pay ......200 Subsistence ... 40 Staff allowance 205 Batta of Ens... 45 245

245

Dep. Assist. Com. of Ordnance. Staff pay ......120 Subsistence ... 40 Batta of Ens... 45 Staff allowance 125

165 165

Troop

| Staff Pay and Ailow-ances drawn at present. Pay and Staff Allowanto be drawn in future | ces |
|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-----|
| Troop Qr. Mast. of Horse Art.                                                                  |     |
| Statt pay72 3 Subsistence                                                                      | 40  |
|                                                                                                | 63  |
|                                                                                                |     |
| 102 3                                                                                          | 03  |
| Conductor of Ordnance.                                                                         |     |
| Subsistence 48 Subsistence                                                                     | 40  |
| Batta of Ens 45 Staff allowance                                                                |     |
|                                                                                                | _   |
|                                                                                                | 93  |
| Sub-Conductor of Ordnance.                                                                     |     |
| Subsistence 35 Subsistence S                                                                   | 30  |
| Batta 15 Staff allowance                                                                       | 20  |
|                                                                                                | _   |
|                                                                                                | 50  |
| 2. The new scale of subsistence an                                                             | ı.a |

2. The new scale of subsistence and staff allowance is to be the same for any month; the former to be drawn in advance and the latter in arrear—no batta will be payable in garrison or cantonment. Tent allowance or house-rent will be drawn according to circumstances, and the horse allowance of troop quarter-master will remain unaltered. In the field, at field posts, or when marching, the same field (half) batta will be drawn as heretofore.

DISCHARGED SOLDIERS.

Fort St. George, June 1, 1827.—The Hon. the Governor in Council, having taken into consideration certain inconveniences connected with the existing system observed in sending discharged European soldiers of the Hon. Company's service to England, is pleased to authorize the following regulations.

Men recommended to be discharged by invaliding, &c. committees, are to remain with their corps until all claims, as far as may be practicable, have been adjusted at regimental head-quarters; all vouchers connected with such claims as may not admit of regimental adjustment, are to be forwarded by commanding officers without delay by tappall, and not by the individuals, to the town-major of Fort St. George.

The proceedings of invaliding, &c. committees, in the case of Europeans, are not to be considered as final. Such men as may be passed by them are to be sent to. Fort St. George, and when collected, are to undergo an examination before a medical committee, to be assembled for that purpose, and at whose recommendation the discharge will be sanctioned.

All men so discharged are to remain upon the strength of their respective corps in receipt of their full pay until embarked for Europe, the date of such embarkation to be notified by the town major of Fort St. George to the adjutant general of the army, when the individuals will be struck off the returns of the corps respectively by orders from that department.

All discharged men are hereafter to be placed in charge of a commissioned officer, in the Company's service, returning to England on furlough. It will be the special duty of the officer in charge to see justice done to his men on the passage home, with respect to their provisions as well as the medical comforts and treatment of the sick, and finally to attend at the India House, furnished with the necessary vouchers of the complete adjustment of their claims upon Government.

Fort St. George, June 26, 1827.—The Hon, the Governor in Council is pleased to direct that the provisions of the general order of the 1st inst., regarding soldiers discharged the service and ordered home, shall be considered equally applicable to time-expired men and pensioners of the Hon. Company's service proceeding to England.

SUPERINTENDING ENGINEERS.

Fort St. George, Sept. 4, 1827. — The Hon. the Governor in Council has deemed it expedient to cancel the rule laid down in paragraph 55 of the engineer regulations, and to direct that when superintending engineers wish to obtain leave of absence from their divisions, &c. their applications to his Exc. the Commander-inchief shall be transmitted to the Military Board, who, in forwarding them, will state whether any objection, connected with the duties of the applicant, exists to a compliance with the request.

The application will be sent to the Military Board through the officer commanding the division, who will report, for the Board's information, the arrangement which the superintending engineer may propose to make for conducting the duties of his department during his absence, or until provided for by superior authority.

COURT-MARTIAL.

ENSIGN R. GOING.

Head-Quarters, Calcutta, Sept. 10, 1827.

—At a General Court-Martial held at Fort St. George, on the 2d day of July 1827, and continued by adjournments to the 11th of the same month, Ens. Richard Going, of H.M.'s First, or Royal Regiment of Foot, was arraigned on the following charge, viz.

Ens. Rich. Going, of H.M.'s First, or the Royal Regiment of Foot, placed in arrest by Capt. Cross, of the same corps, at the desire and on the complaint of Capt. John Charretie, commander of the H.C.'s ship Bombay, and charged as fol-

With conduct unbecoming the character of an officer and a gentleman, in seizing by the throat and kicking Cadet Sydenham Geo. Chas. Renand, on the deck of the H.C.'s ship Bombay, at sea, on the 12th of May 1827.

Upon which charge the court came to the following decision:

The court having most maturely weighed and considered the whole of the evidence brought forward in support of the prosecution, as well as what the prisoner Ens. Rich. Going hath urged in his defence, and the evidence in support thereof. is of opinion, Finding.—Guilty of seizing by the neck and striking with his knee Mr. Cadet Svdenham Geo. Chas. Renand, on the deck of the H.C.'s ship Bombay, at sea, on the 12th of May 1827; but the court is further of opinion, that from the peculiar circumstances of the case, the prisoner's conduct is not liable to the imputation of being unbecoming the character of an officer and a gentleman.

Sentence.-The court having found the prisoner guilty to the extent above stated, which being conduct irregular and intemperate, doth sentence him, the said Ens. Rich. Going, to lose one step of his regimental rank, and to rank next below Ens.

W. B. Johnston in the regiment. The foregoing opinion and sentence are approved and confirmed.

(Signed) G. T. WALKER. The court throughout the trial of Ens. Going appears to have acted with judgment and discrimination, and the Lieutenant-general has been gratified to learn that this young officer has been able to clear himself in its opinion from the most serious part of the charges against him, and he earnestly hopes that the slight sentence here allotted will yet serve as a sufficient example, to others as well as to himself, that a blow under any circumstances cannot be suffered in the army without punishment, whatever may be the cause of irritation; and although youth, incxperience, and previous cause of irritation, have been here allowed to plead in excuse, let no one flatter himself that such excuses can be lightly admitted. No one receives a commission till of an age when he is expected, as a man, fully to feel as well as to comprehend what is due to the character of a gentleman, which, as an officer, he is bound to support, and he is early made acquainted with the Articles of War, which dictate the penalty entailed upon my infraction of this his highest duty. Never then let it be forgotten, that a blow to an equal is an insult-to an inferior, tyranny. How then, under all the consequences flowing from either case, can any one hope to purify himself from the additional character of ungentlemanlike behaviour, and the positive consequences attached to it, under the 26th article of the 14th section of the Articles of War?

(Signed) G. T. WALKER, Lieut. Gen. The foregoing order is to be entered in the general order-book, and read at the head of every regiment in his Majesty's service in India.

By order of the Commander-in-chief, A. MACDONALD. Adj. Gen. of H.M.'s army in India.

CIVIL APPOINTMENTS.

Sopt. 14. E. P. Thomson, Esq., to be head assistant to principal collector and assistant magistrate in Cuddapah.

Mr. Surgeon H. Atkinson to be secretary to mint committee.

18. C. M. Bushby, Esq., to be register to Pro-vincial Court for Western division. 25. Mr. N. Birsay, to be master attendant at Negapatam.

ECCLESIASTICAL APPOINT-MENTS

Sept. 7. The Rev. R. A. Denton permitted to ace his services at disposal of government of Fort Cornwallis.

The Rev. John Hallewell to have charge of Black Town Chapel, Hospital, and Jail, from date of Mr. Denton's embarkation for Penang.

MILITARY APPOINTMENTS. PROMOTIONS, &c.

Fort St. George, Aug. 17, 1827.—Capt. John Metcalfe, 4th N.I., transferred to invalid estab. at his own request.

29th N.I. Sen. Lieut. J. S. Wyllie to be capt, and Sen. Ens. J. White to be Lieut., v. Sinclair dec.; date 13th Aug. 1827.

Lieut. C. H. Græme, 5th L.C., to be assistant to resident in Mysore.

Capt. St. John French, 2d Europ. Regt., to be a temporary sub-assist. com. gen.

Aug. 21.—Licut. S. Best, of engineers, to be assistant to superintend. engineer in northern divi-

Capt. A. H. Coiberg, 13th N.I., to command 1st bat. of pioneers, v. Sinclair dec. Capt. J. Macdonald, 45th N.I., to be brigade major in Malabar and Canara, v. Coiberg.

29th N.I. Lieut. F. L. Nicolay to be qu. mast., interp., and paym., v. Wyllie prom. 1st Extra N.I. Lieut. G. Wright, 10th N.I., to be adj., v. Nicolay.

Infinitry. Sen. Maj. R. L. Evans to be lieut. col., in suc. to M'Leod prom.; dated 7th July 1827.

22d N.I. Sen. Capt. J. Bayley to be maj., Sen. Lieut. J. F. Bird to be capt., and Sen. Ens. J. F. Kellet to be lieut., in suc. to Evans prom.; dated 7th July 1827.

Assist Surg. R. Filson, to be port and marine surgeon, and to have charge of Male Asylum and police estab., v. M'Leod resigned.

Assist .Surg.W. R. Smyth app. to charge of sick officers at Saint Thome, and of south-east district of Royapettah, v. Filson.

Head-Quarters, Aug. 21. - Ens. G. G. Browne moved, at his own request, from 40th to 29th

Aug. 22.—Assist. Surg. J. M'Farland removed from 1st brig. horse utill to 7th Lc.—Assist. Surg. D. Munro removed from 29th to 5th N.I.— Assist. Surg. M. B. Pollock app. to do duty with H.M. 8 46th Foot.

Aug. 25.—Licut. Col. F. W. Wilson removed from 22d to 37th N.I., and Licut. Col. R. L. Evans (late prom.) posted to 22d N.I.

Capt. J. Metcalfe (recently invalided) posted to 1st Nat. Vet. Bat.

Assist. Surg. Q. Jamieson removed from 6th to 4th N.I., and Assist. Surg. J. Thompson from 1st to 40th ditto.

Fort St. George, Aug. 24.—Capt. A. Tulloch, deputy in commissariat department, to be dep. com. gen., v. Grant dec.

Dep. Assist. Com. Gen. Capt. R. M'Leod to be assist. com. gen., v. Tulloch.

Sub-Assist. Com. Gen. Lleut. E. Armstrong to be dep. assist. com. gen., v. M'Leod.

Temp. Sub-Assist. Com. Gen. Lleut. J. Hill to sub-assist. com. gen., v. Armstrong. Lieut. G. H. Thomas, 7th L.C., to be a temp.

aub-assist. com. gen. 4th N.I. Sen. Lieut. J. D. Stokes to be capt., and Sen. Ens. H. W. Wood to be lieut., v. Metcalfe invalided; dated 18th Aug. 1827.

Aug. 28.—Cadets J. R. Starke, R. Younghusband, Wm. Drew, A. E. Moore, H. Maughan, and W. B. Littlehales admitted to infantry, and prom. to ensigns.

Artillery. Lieut. J. T. Baldwin to be adj. to 3d bat., v. Baylis permitted to return to Europe. 5th L.C. Sen. Cornet H. Fraser to be lleut., v.

Gaitskell invalided; date 21st March 1827.

9th N.I. Sen. Ens. R. S. M. Sprye to be lieut., v. Holland resigned; dated 15th March 1827. 18th N.I. Sen. Ens. H. S. Kennedy to be lieut., v. Mitchell dec.; dated 12th Jan. 1827.

34th or C.L.I. Sen. Lieut. T. S. Claridge to be capt., and Sen. Ens. W. T. Furlonge to be lieut., v. Hodgson retired; dated 21st June 1826.

Aug. 31.—Mr. H. C. Ludlow admitted on estabase an assist. surg., and appointed to do duty under gar. surg. of Fort St. George.

Assist. Surgs. P. Poole and W. Woollett permitted to enter on general duties of army.

Sept. 4.—Lieut. Col. G. Cadell, 23d Light Inf., and dep. adj. gen. of army, permitted to retire from H.C.'s service in compliance with his request. Lieut. J. Ogilvle, H M.'s 13th Drags., to be an extra aid-de-camp to Hon, the Governor. Cadets B. Bale and Joslah Smith admitted to infantry, and prom. to ensigns.

Head-Quarters, Aug. 28.—Lieut. Home, of artill., removed from 3d to 4th bat., and Lieut. Beck from 1st to 4th bat. artillery.

Sept. 1.—Lieut. R. F. Eams, 33d N.I., removed from rifle corps, and directed to join his regt.

Sopt. 4.—Cornets (recently prom.) posted to Regts. John Whitlock to 8th L.C.; C. T. Willis, 5th do.; Wm. Wyndham, 8th do.; S. W. Hennah, 7th do.; W. H. Ricketts, 6th do.; F. G. J. Lascelles, 2d do.; N. Wroughton, 5th do.

do.; N. Wroughton, 5th do.

Ensigns (recently prom.) posted to Regts. Edw.
Stevenson to 9th N.I. H. Pereira, 43d do. R.
Mackenzie, 8th do. T. A. Jenkins, 33d do. D.
Pearron, 3th or C.L.I. R. Cannan, 40th N.I.
C. H. St. J. Babington, 2d Europ. Regt. John
Merritt, 4th N.I. Jas. Hogarth, 2th do. W. R.
Annesiey, 38th do. Gregory Islanes, 18th do. S.
C. Macpherson, 9th do. Wm. Taylor, 7th do.
F. H. Sansom, 42d do. P. E. L. Rickards, 17th do. S. G. C. Renaud, 16th do. Jos. Dods, 4th do. Geo. Davis, 45th do. Wm. Garrow, 21st do.

Ensiran Secontilu roum. Jumointed to dutty. J.

Ensiran Secontilu roum. Jumointed to dutty. J.

Ensign (recently prom.) appointed to dedgy. J. R. Starke, R. Younghusband, W. Drew, A. E. Moore, H. Maughan, and W. B. Littlehales, with infantry recruiting depôt.

Assist. Surg. W. Wooliett, app. to do duty with 1st N.I., and Assist. Surg. P. Poole, with 2d do.

Fort St. George, Sept. 7.—Capt. B. R. Hitchins, 51st N.I., to be a dep. adj. gen. of army with official rank of major, v. Cadell retired.

Capt. II. White, 7th N.I., to be assist. adj. gen. of army, v. Hltchlns.

Capt. R. Alexander, 48th N.I., to be dep. assist. qu. mast. gen. in centre division, v. White.

Infuntry. Sen. Maj. G. Hunter, from 13th N.I., to be lieut. col., v. Cadell retired; dated 5th Sept. 1827.

13th N.I. Sen. Capt. J. Wilson to be maj. Sen. Lleut. J. Briggs to be capt., and Sen. Ens. H. C. Bevor to be lieut., in suc. to Hunter prom.; dated 5th Sept. 1827.

Assist. Surg. M. B. Pollok permitted to enter on general duties of army from 10th April 1827.

Mr. John Towell app. a temporary assist, sure from 24th Aug.

Lleut. R. F. Otter, 28th N.I., to be an assist surveyor of 2d class.

Sept. 11.—Artillery. Sen. 1st-Lieut. P. Hammond to be capt., v. Brooke dec.; dated 6th Aug. 1827. Maj. R. Jeffries, 6th L.C., transferred to inv estab. at his request.

Head-Quarters, Sept 10.—Lieut. Col. G. Hunter (late prom.) posted to 23d or Wallajahbad L.I., v Cadell.

Ens. H. Maughan directed to do duty with 21st N.I.

Scpt. 11.—Lieut. Col. J. S. Fraser removed from it to 24th N.I., and Lleut. Col. J. Green from 24th to 1st ditto.

Assist. Surg. J. T. Maule removed from 1st to 19th N. I.

Ens. B. Bale and J. Smith (lately prom.) app to do duty with infantry recruiting depôt.

Sept. 12.—Maj. R. Jeffries, recently transf. to inv. estab. posted to Carnatic Europ. Vet. Bat. Sept. 14.—Temp. Assist. Surg. J. Towell placed under orders of superintend, surg. northern diviblon of army. Sept. 17.—Assist. Surgs. posted. J. B. Preston to 19th N.1.; G. Grigg, 28th do.; J. Laurence, 8th do.; D. M'Dougall, 21st do.; W. Woollet, 1st do.

Ens. G. Davis removed, at his own request, from 45th to 43d N.I.

Sept. 18.—Ens. C. H. Wilson removed, at his own request, from 6th to 45th N.I.

Firt St. George, Sept. 14.—6th L.C. Sen. Capt. R. 11, Russell to be man, Sen. Lleut. M. M. Neill to be capt., and Sen. Cornet J. Whistler to be heat., v. Jeffries invalided; dated 12th Sept. 1827. 44th N.I. Sen. Ens. W. C. Onslow to be lieut., v. Baber dec.; dated 22d Jan. 1827.

Licut. Col. Com. G. Wahab, 20th N.1., to have command at Trichinopoly, v. Hamilton permitted to return to Europe.

Lieut. Col. C. Grant, H.M.'s 54th regt., to command troops in Malabar and Canara, v. M'Bean, permitted to return to Europe.

Capt. T. Swaine, 49th N.I., to be postmaster at Bangalore, v. Wilson prom.

Licut. and Brev. Capt. J. Buchanan, 1st L.C., to be barrack-master at Bangalore, v. Wilson

Capt. R. S. Wilson, 21st N.I., to be barrack-master at presidency, v. Russell prom.

Lieut. J. (*. Coffin, 12th N.I., to be fort adj. at Fort St. George, v. Wilson.

1st L.C. Lleut. W. Walker, to be qu. mast, interp., and paym., v. Buchanan; Lleut. T.A.A. Munsey, to be adj., v. Walker.

Sept. 18.—Capt. F. Bond, of artil., to be commissary of stores at Prince of Wales Island, v. Westel.

Brooke dec.

4th N.I. Lieut. W. C. Chinnery to be adj., v. Church dec.

12th N.I. Lieut. E. Peil to be qu. mast., interp., and paymast., v. Coffin; Lieut. R. T. Cox to be adj., v. Peil.

39th N.I. Sen. Ens. T. Maclean to be lieut., v. Warren dec.; dated 2d July 1827.

Ens. D. Hayes, 39th N.I., permitted to resign H.C.'s service, at his request.

Assist. Surgs. T. Grlgg, D. Macdougall, and Jos. Laurence permitted to enter on general duties of army.

Cadet C. J. Cooke admitted to artil., and prom-to 2d-lieut.—Cadets C. Sherard, J. A. S. Coxwell, H. Thatcher, E. Goodenough, J. J. Refmond, J. C. Whitty, J. Seager, C. F. Compton, H. T. Hillyard, T. F. Nicolay, T. Lowe, and R. V. Wellesford admitted to infantry, and prom- to ensigns.

Sopt. 21.—Cadets E. J. Stephenson and R. Precott admitted to cavalry, and prom. to cornetsCadets J. H. Stapleton, G. W. Sharp, E. G. Colton, John Sibbald, Edw. Slack, H. A. Tremlett, J. C. Turnbull, and Thos. Blackburn, admitted to infantry, and urom to cantoms. infantry, and prom. to ensigns. Sept.25.

Sept. 25.—Assist. Surg. J. Bell, attached to resident at Tanjore. Assist. Surg. H. S. Brice permitted to enter on general duties of army.

Assist. Surg. H. S. Fleming to be permanent as-sistant and hospital storekeeper in garrison hospi-tal of Fort St. George.

Capt. J. J. Underwood, superintend. engineer in southern division, to act as superintend. engineer with force in Dooab.

Lleut. F. C. Cotton, assist. to superintending in Dooab.

Oct. 2.—Lieut. Col. Com. C. Farran, 14th N.I., app. to command Trichinopoly, v. Wahab permitted to return to Europe.

Lieut. Col. Com. C. T. G. Bishop, 28th N.I., to have command at Trichinopoly until arrival of Lieut. Col. Com. Farran.

Mr. R. Cole, admltted as an assist. surg., and op, to do duty under garrison surgeon of Fort app. to e William.

Capt. W. Stewart, 2d Europ. regt., permitted to place his services at disposal of resident at Hyderabad.

Head-Quarters, Sept. 25.—Lieut. Col. B. W. Lee, removed from 11th to 43d N.I., and Lieut. Col. C. Ferrier from 43d to 11th ditto.

Cornets (recently prom.) appointed to do duty. E. J. Stephenson, with 1st L.C.; R. Prescott, 3d do. J. Mephenson, with 1st L.C.; R. Prescott, 3d do. Rasigas (recently prom.) appointed to do duty. J. H. Stapleton, with 2d N. I.; T. Blackburne, 2d do.; J. J. Redmond, 9th do.; E. G. Cotton, 10th do.; C. F. Compton, 2lst do.; F. Slack, 2lst do.; T. F. Nuclay, 2pth do.; J. C. Turribull, 43d do.; G. W. Sharp, 33d do.; R. V. Willesford, 38th do.; C. Sherard, 43d do.; J. A. S. Coxwell, 43d do.; C. Sherard, 43d do.; H. A. Treulett, 43d do.; J. C. Whitty, 62d do.; H. A. Treulett, 43d do.; J. C. Whitty, 62d do.; H. Thatcher, infantry recruiting depot; E. Goodenough, do.; J. Seager, do.; H. T. Hillyard, do.; J. Subbald, do.

Sept. 26.—Ens. S. C. Macpherson removed, at his own request, from 9th to 8th N.I.

Sept. 27.—2d-Lieuts. Croft, Orr, and Mawdsley, posted to 2d bat. artillery.

Assist. Surg. H. S. Brice posted to 42d N.I. Sept. 28.—Ens. J. G. Leathern removed, at his own request, from 1st to 33d N.I.

Oct. 4.—Maj. Gen. and Col. C. Macauley removed from 10th to 52d N.I., and Lieut. Col. Com. W. C. Fraser from 52d to 10th ditto.

Officers returned to duty, from Rurope. Capt.
A. Inglis, 48th N.I., and Lieut. A. R. Taylor, 4th
L.C.; arrived 23d Aug. 1827.—Lieut. Col. R. H.
Vates, 44th N.I., and Lieut. H. W. Hadfield, 1st 4o.; arrived 26th Aug.—Assist. Surg. J. B. Preston; Capt. W. Bablington, 6th L.C.; and Lieut.
C.A. Kerr, 2d L.C.; arrived 12th Sept.—Maj. A.
Cooke, 38th N.I.; arrived 12th Sept.—Lieut. Col.
B. W. Lee, 11th N.I., Lieut. J. Sandys, 19th do.;
arrived 17th Sept.—Lieut. II. E. C. O'Connor, 32d
N.I.; arrived 19th Sept.— N.I.; arrived 19th Sept.

FURLOUGHS.

FURLOUGHS.

To Europe.—Aug. 17. Lieut. and Brev. Capt. J.
B. Nottuige, 12th N.I., for health.—Lieut. R. H.
Robertson, 36th N.I., for health.—21. Ens. H. A.
Kennedy, 14th N.I., for health.—21. Ens. H. A.
Kennedy, 14th N.I., for health.—12. Ens. H. A.
Kennedy, 14th N.I., for health.—28. Lieut. T.
Baylis, of artill., for health.—Lieut. H. S. Newboli, 4th L.C..—31. Capt. J. Metcalle, inv. estab., for health.—Sept. 4. Maj. H. Ross, 42d N.I.—14.
Lieut. Co. C. Ferrier, 43d N.I., for health.—
Lieut. H. Currie, 9th N.I., for health.—Cornet
T. J. Taylor, 7th L.C., for one year (via Bombay), 24. Lieut. H. H. Mortliner, of artill., for health for proceed from Penang.—18. Capt. T. S. Clatige, 3th L. Inf., for health.—21. Capt. P. Corbet, 12th N.I.—25. Lieut. Col. Com. G. Wahah, Oct. 5. Lieut. C. Butler, 1st Europ. regt., for

To Calcutta.—Oct. 2. Maj. Gen. Sir Jasper Nicolls commanding northern div. of army.

To Bombay.—Aug. 21. Surg. W. S. Anderson, for four months.—31. Capt. R. C. Campbell, 43d N.I., for six months.—Sept. 7. Ens. W. A. Moore, 37th N.I., for six months, for health.

To Sca.—Aug. 17. Capt. J. Pew, 40th N.I., for four months, for health (to proceed from Bombay).
—Sept. 7. Lieut. W. A. Miller, 4th N.I., ditto ditto (to proceed from ditto).

Cancelled .- Lieut. J. Pasmore, Pension estab., to Europe.

LAW.

SUPREME COURT.

The fourth term for the current year terminated October 2d. The proceedings are represented to have possessed an un-usual share of public interest; but no detailed report of them is given in the Madras papers, owing (as they state) to inability to afford the expense of paying a reporter. The following meagre account of some of the causes is given in the Madras Courier.

The first was an action in trespass, brought by the Rev. Fré Lawrence de Sassari, the late superior of the Capuchin Mission at this presidency, against the Rev. Fré Baptiste, the present prefect, the Rev. Fré Honorato, Edward Moorat, Esq., John Arathoon, Esq., and several others. This trial occupied the unremitting attention of the court for eight entire days, in the course of which the plaintiff's case was fully proved—that he had been assaulted, turned out of his cell, and all that was therein taken possession of, in the name of the church, by the present prefect and some of the other defendants. Much time was occupied, and much ingenuity, ability, and perseverance displayed, in proving the customs of the order to which the plaintiff belonged, and that, according to the vow which he had taken, he could possess nothing of his own. The plaintiff disclaimed seeking for vindictive damages; he only asked for what was his own to be returned to him, and a slight compensation to vindicate his character from the indignities which it had received. The verdict was for the plaintiff against the three firstnamed defendants: damages 80,000 rupees, to be reduced to 500 rupees in case the property taken out of the plaintlff's cell is restored within four days from the date of the verdict. The property has been restored, and the verdict entered accordingly for the mitigated sum.

The counsel for the plaintiff, who sued in forma pauperis, was Mr. Bathie; and for the defendant, the Advocate General and Mr. Bridgman.

The other important case was the wellknown equity suit of Causey Chitty, v. the Hon. Company and John Sullivan, which has been so often in different shapes before the court. It came on this term for argument of a plea to the jurisdiction of the court, put in by the Hon. Company, which, after long and able argument, was overruled, with costs, being bad in form, on 29th September. Counsel for the complainant, Messrs. Lewis and Savage; for the defendant, the Advocate General and Mr. Bridgman.

October 8th.

The fourth sessions of oyer and terminer and gool delivery commenced this morning before Mr. Justice Comyn and Mr. Justice Ricketts, the Chief Justice having left Madras on the 6th for Calcutta.

Sir Robert Comyn delivered a charge to the grand jury, which included an Armenian gentleman, Mr. Arathoon Kerakoose.

Fifteen natives were summoned to serve on the petit jury; and some of them sat for the first time as jurors.

August 4.

In the Goods of Capt. James Tagg, deceased .- In this case a caveat was filed by the registrar against the grant of letters of administration to Mr. Wm. Waddell, merchant at Madras. Mr. Waddell alleged that Capt. Tagg died intestate, without next of kin in India, and entitled to property within the jurisdiction of the court, not exceeding 4,800 rupees; that the petitioner had been appointed executor of the will of James Waddell, deceased, and had obtained probate of that will under the seal of the court; that James Waddell was creditor of Tagg, under a bond dated 1st July 1814, for money borrowed and received by Capt. Tagg of James Waddell; that there was due on this bond 1,182 star pagodas; that James Waddell received from Capt. Tagg several small sums for and on account of and in part liquidation of the bond and interest, and on no other account whatsoever, in the whole 720 star pagodas; that there was due to the petitioner, as executor of James Waddell, upon the bond of Capt. Tagg, 462 star pagodas; the petitioner praying for administration, as the executor of James Waddell, a bond creditor of Capt. Tagg, the intestate.

The Advocate-General appeared on the part of the registrar, in support of the caveat, and Mr. Lewis for Mr. William Waddell, the petitioner.

The Chief Justice stated his impression to be, that every creditor had a preferable claim to the administration of the estates of intestates to the register of the court, provided such creditor gave sufficient evidence of his debt; and that the creditor should be called upon to substantiate the validity of his demand with the same sort of evidence as would be required to prove a debt at Nisi Prius. His lordship thought that the words of the charter of the Supreme Court had reference to the old practice in the ecclesiastical courts in England, of citing the next of kin, which however was not according to the present practice here; and that under the charter the next of kin of intestates were in the first place entitled to administration, and in default of such appearing, the princi pal creditor, and then the other creditor of the deceased. His lordship remarked that to ascertain who should be considered a creditor for the purpose of applying fo administration, it would be necessary to refer to the 39th and 40th of Geo. III. which required that the creditor should make out his claim to the satisfaction of the court in default of which the register was required to apply. He did not think that the petitioner had made out the amount of his debt satisfactorily; that there appeared to be allowance of interest upon interest, which could only be the case in a running account, and on a running account, by the rule of the court, a creditor was not entitled to apply. His lordship observed that the petitioner had not made out his claim to his satisfaction.

Mr. Justice Comyn observed, that two questions arose out of the matter before the court : in regard to the particular circounstances of the case; and, generally, as to the right of the creditor or registrar. The 39th and 40th Geo. 111., which provided for the establishment of the court, directed its operations in matters like that before them, and declared that whenever any British subject should die intestate. and no next of kin or creditor should appear and make out their claim to the administration, then that the register should apply for such letters. This act substituted the register for the men of straw, who had formerly been in the habit of applying for administration under the style of " friends of the deceased." The register, in his lordship's opinion, had no more right to apply, provided there were next of kin or creditors, than any native inhabitant. He did not think that the rule of the court had ever been construed so as to contravene the act of Parliament, which ought to regulate the practice of the court on these occasions; but if his lordship had found such to have been the case he would have thought it his duty, and would not have scrupled, to treat it as a nonentity. The rule was only applicable to open accounts; it applied to persons swearing generally that they were creditors according to what his lordship understood to be law; the next of kin, if residing within the jurisdiction of the court, had the best claim to administration; in default of such next of kin, the creditor had a right to apply; and in default of such next of kin or creditor, then the registrar ought to apply for letters of administration. The petition before the court was certainly open to objection; the amount due upon the bond might have been more correctly stated, but inasmuch as the court did not sit as tellers of the exchequer in England, they were not called upon to examine the correctness of the accounts. It was sworn, in the petition of Mr. William Waddell, that a certain balance was due upon a His lordship thought the petibond. tioner had gone too far, for that if he had rested on the sum of 462 star pagodas and 15 fanams, as being due to him as executor, on the bond, he would have shewn sufficient to entitle him as a creditor to apply for administration. According to the act of Parliament, the next of kin were just as much called upon to make out their claim as the creditor was; and if the latter was to be confined to the strictest evidence of his debtato must the former, by proof of pedigree, shew their claim. His lordship thought the petitioner was entitled to the administration prayed.

Mr. Justice Ricketts thought the creditor was generally entitled to administration in preference to the registrar, but that there was an exception to the general rule, and that the petitioner came under that exception. A person applying as a creditor for administration, his lordship thought, was bound to shew that he was such a creditor as the law recognized for this purpose, and that a person stating, as in the case before the court, that various little sums had been received in payment of principal and interest due upon a bond was not sufficient; the payments were first applicable to the liquidation of interest due, and then, in case of overplus, towards the reduction of the principal. It appeared, in his lordship's opinion, that this was a debtor and creditor account, and he thought it came within the meaning of the rule of court, and must be considered an open account. He thought the petition should be refused.

The caveat was allowed. No costs were given on either side.

MISCELLANEOUS.

THE LATE SIR THOMAS MUNRO.

The subscription at this presidency for erecting a monument to the late Sir Thos. Munro amounted, on the 3d of October, to 92,039 Madras rupees.

"An old friend of Sir Thos. Munro" has suggested, in one of the papers, the following plan to commemorate the late governor, and at the same time perpetuate his memory in his native place, Glasgow. He proposes: 1st. That a sum of money be raised by public voluntary subscription, the interest of which shall be applied to the purpose of educating three young persons, natives of Glasgow, for the three respective situations of writer, cadet, and assistant surgeon. 2d. That the Hon. the Court of Directors be applied to, requesting their support in carrying into effect this mark of our esteem, by granting annually, and alternately, one of these three appointments to the persons so educated. 3d. That these appointments have the honorary appellation of "The Munro Asiatic Journ. Vol. 25, No. 147.

Writership "-" The Munro Cadetship," and "The Munro Assistant Surgeoncy."
The writer concludes his proposition with the following remarks:

From the extraordinary degree of respect in which Sir Thos. Munro was held by the Court of Directors, so fully demonstrated in their public despatches, there can be little doubt, I should conceive, but that the application above alluded to would be successfully made, and when it is considered that the obtainment of either of these appointments in so peculiar a manner, must give to those so obtaining them the most powerful stimulus and incentive for good conduct, and that the result must necessarily prove of incalculable advantage to the service; there remains still less reason to suppose that the Court would refuse their liberality. Should this institu-tion have but the effect of producing one such servant as Sir Thos. Munro in the course of a century, how amply might they consider themselves repaid. With regard to the sum necessary to be raised for this purpose, one lac of rupces would be amply sufficient, and although this sum may at first appear large, as there is every reason to believe that, from this institution combining utility with its main object, it would meet with general support throughout the three presidencies, no difficulty would be experienced in raising so large a sum. It is more than probable, also, that the subscription for the statue will exceed greatly in amount the demand for its expenses, and in this case the surplus might be transferred to the institution fund.

ASSEMBLY AT THE PUBLIC HALL.

The public hall vesterday evening exhibited a display of beauty and fashion we have seldom seen equalled at this presidency, and we may now fairly congratu-late the society of Madras upon having ohtained, from the liberality of government, a mansion so well suited to purposes of festivity. The arrangement for evening did ample credit to the superintending stewards, and we were delighted to perceive that a distinguished member of our society was present upon this second occasion, to promote, by her never-failing influence, the continuance of monthly assemblies. It would be indecorous on our part if we attempted to particularize any of the lovely countenances we saw smiling around us, though we may be pardoned if we envy the sister presidency the acquisition of beauty she is about to obtain by the arrival of the goddess of wisdom at her destined port. We have heard it whispered, however, amongst "our gallant gay Lotharios," that Minerva has proved both generous and wise, and has left us a constellation of beauty not yet visible to illumine our hemisphere and console us for their departure. We understand that one of the s E gallant gallant bechelors, who is well known at the presidency for his hospitality and liborality, has issued cards for a splendid fète at his mansion on Friday next (to-morrow), which we are convinced will be graced by all the beauty and fashion of Madras, as we have reason to believe that the entertainment is given to a lady who, by her urbanity and pleasing manners, has been so truly kind and zealous a promoter of the gaieties of Madras,—Mad. Gov. Gaz., Sept. 6.

BACHELORS' FETE.

The party which we announced in our gazette of the 6th instant was to be given by one of our gallant bachelors to the lovely lady at present the head of our society on Friday last, was one of the most splendid entertainments we ever witnessed at Madras; all the beauty and elegance of the presidency were assembled at Major Hanson's mansion on this occasion. ball was opened by Lady Walker, whose kindness and affability contributed greatly to the pleasures of the evening. Dancing continued until past twelve, when supper being announced, the gallant host attended his fascinating guest to the table, which was covered with all the delicacies and luxumies of the season; the wines were peculiarly fine and cool. After supper dancing re-commenced, and the ladies did not depart until past three o'clock .- Ibid., Sept. 11.

COLONEL AND MRS. CHAMBERS.

Lieut. Col. Chambers, C. B., H.M.'s 41st regt., accompanied by Mrs. and Miss Chambers, were on their way from Beilary to Bangalore, on a visit to their son and daughter, when the Col. and his lady were both attacked suddenly by that baneful disorder the cholera morbus, and both died in a short time after, within a few hours of each other, on the 29th August. This melancholy event occurred at Baughapilly, about seventy miles from Bangalore, at which place it appears that cholera rages with fatal violence.

Lieut. Col. Peter Latouche Chambers entered H.M.'s army as an ensign in the 41st regt. nearly twenty-five years ago, and has subsequently accompanied that regiment wherever it has been employed. In North America, sometimes commanding a part of it; at others, in command of a brigade of militia (which he had been selected to form and organize), and also in charge of a division in the qr. mast. general's department. He was engaged in nine several actions with the Americans, on many of which occasions he called forth the thanks of the commander of the forces for his zeal, activity, and intrepid gallantry. During the late war in Ava, where he continued in service against all raedical advice, and in spite of ill-health and debility (the effects of a severe wound). He was in seven engagements with the enemy, in six of which he commanded his corpan here also eliciting the highest commendations of his seniors, and shewing the same zeal, unbroken, and elastic spirit, bearing him above all bodily ills under hardships and difficulties of no common nature. which led him foremost always in the ranks of honour. During his services in North America he lost an eve. For his conduct at Detroit, where he commanded the brigade he had formed, he received a gold medal. For his services in Ava (where he was also wounded whilst gallantly leading his men into a stockade), he was specially selected, immediately after the war, by the present Commander-inchief in India, for a Lieut. Colonelcy, and subsequently he was honoured by his Majesty with the Order of the Bath.

He was about to return to his native country to repair a much shattered constitution sacrificed to a zealous discharge of his professional duties.—[Mad. Cour., Sept. 8,

THE LATE COL. NOBLE.

We have to add another to the long list of distinguished individuals whom this present year has taken from amongst us, in recording the demise of Lieut-Colonel John Noble, of the Madras Artillery, Companion of the Bath, in his 48th year which event took place during the night of the 16th instant, on board the Razburgh Castle, when she had just completed her voyage from England.

The military career of Lieut.-Colonel

The military career of Lieut.-Colonel Noble, C. B., was equally brilliant and useful. He participated in most of the principal services of the coastarmy, during the last 32 years, and was, on all occasions, distinguished for judgment, spirit, and decision. He formed the noble corps of horse artillery, both European and native, for which command he was selected in 1805, by Sir John Crądock, on the recommendation of his Grace the Duke of Wellington, whose confidence on service, and whose friendship in private life, Lieut-Colonel Noble enjoyed and merited.

An obituary notice is, generally speaking, of all things the most difficult to pen. There are the many to conciliate and the few to satisfy; but, in the instance of Lieut.-Colonel Noble, the suffrages of most men will surely be united; for while few have attained a more honourable distinction as a soldier, still fewer have acquired an equal degree of love and esteem as members of society. He had the happy talent to command without severity, and to preserve discipline and good order without losing the affections of his officers and men. He ruled through the medium of attachment, and those who served under him were professionally efficient and privately happy. He may, in a word, without disperagement to others, and without the fear of envy, (for envy dwells not in the tomb,) be held out as an example to the generality of those he has left behind him. His abilities were of the first order; and his tact and observation, aided by experience, had gained for him an unusual knowledge of his profession. He was pious without ostentation, just from principle, friendly from feeling, generous from the nobleness of his nature, brave and enterprizing from a chivalric spirit, decided from an excellent judgment and consement self-confidence. Character distinguished him, truth guided him, and honour accompanied him. He is gone! and his fame is the comfort and consolation of his surviving friends .- Mad. Gov. Gaz. July 26.

OPERATIONS IN THE DOOAB.

Camp near Cotabaughy, Sept. 26 .- A body of Kolaporeans having taken post in an almost impregnable ghurry, fourteen miles from camp, a strong detachment, under Major Henry, of the 23d L.I., marched on the 24th inst. to surprise them. The officer commanding the Dooab force accompanied the detachment, which had a most fatiguing and disastrous march, during which the spare ammunition was lost, and several officers and men were nearly drowned in attempting to cross a stream which intersected the line of march. Upon reaching the enemy's position, a message was sent by the British commanding officer, to the commandant of the ghurry, requiring him to lay down arms and evacuate the place; in case of non-compliance with the proposal, a threat was intimated that the place would be stormed. Two hours elapsed, when the enemy condescended to send a reply to the proposal, in the following terms: "we cannot part with our arms; rather than thus disgrace ourselves, we will fight; we are not afraid of you." A second message was sent, informing the enemy that they would be permitted to retire with their arms, unmolested, provided they immediately eva-cuated the ghurry. With this offer they complied; and upon their marching out, discovered that their number was only 150! Upon examining the ghurry, not a gun or even jingal had been mounted on it! The enemy in retiring, plundered a village a few miles distant, carrying the inhabitants off to Kolapore. The British detachment was, at the above date, about to advance in the direction of Bhooj, a ghurry on the right bank of the Dood ry on the right bank of the Gunga, within twenty miles of Kolapore

SHIPPING

Arrivals.

Sept. 3. Pacific, Worthing, from Philadelphia.

—7. John Dunn, Hicks, from London and Mau-litius.—8. Enterprise, Edmonds, from Bombay.

***Cor**—**Addates.**

-0. James Sibbaki, Forbes, from Bengst.—12. Princess Charlotte of Weles, Biden, from London; and Hestentos, Sinclair, from Penang.—13. Kingeton, Bowen, from London; and Louise, Harris, from Sumatra.—14. Emelia, Duffsy, from Mauritus.—15. Coromandel, Labal, from Bordesux.—73. Venitia, Cape, acc.—17. Ekiza, Sutton, from London.—21. Lidie, Ducton, from Bordesux.—73. Venitia, Malmeeley, from London.—30. Greekes, Allen, from Louisen; and Chief, Munro, from London; and Chief, Munro, from Louisen, and Chief, Munro, from Louisen, from Calcutta.—6. Norfolk, Kingself, From Calcutta.—10. Harbury, Lee, from Calcutta.—17. Chief. Laud. West, from London; and H.M.S. Hamid, West, from London: and H.M.S. Hamid, Astley, from Fontanouth.—18. Diadem, Wilson, from London.

Departures.

Sept. 5. Lody Bast. Evans, for Calcutta.—9. Minerva, Probyn, and Resource, Fenn, both for Calcutta.—16. Minerva, Probyn, and Resource, Fenn, both for Calcutta.—16. Kingaton, Bowen, and John Domen, Micky, both for Calcutta.—30. Lody Mingaton, Faith, for Calcutta.—30. Lody Mingaton, Faith, for Calcutta.—30. Lody Mingaton, Faith, for Calcutta.—10. Lody Mingaton, Faith, for Calcutta.—10. Lody Mingaton, Faith, for Calcutta.—10. Duron, both for Calcutta.—10. Lorondon, Ind. Lodge, Durons, both for Calcutta.—17. Clude, Munro, for Calcutta, and Enterprize, Edmonds, for Penang, Malacca, and Singapore.—13. Duvid Scott, Thornhill, for London.—18. Janus Sibbaid, Forbes, for London, and Childe Harold, West, for Calcutta.

RIRTHS.

Aug. 31. At St. Thomé, Mrs. John Rodrigues, of a daughter. Sept. 1. The lady of John Arathoon, Esq., of a daughter.

daughter.
4. At Nagpore, the lady of Lieut. Col. Wilson, rifle corps, of a son.
12. At Bangalore, the lady of Capt. G. Hutchlson, Trichinopoly, L. Inf., of a daughter.
— The lady of Capt. Geo. Brady, 33d Regt., of a daughter. a daughter.

a daughter.

15. At Samulcottah, the lady of Lieut. T. P.

11ay, 22d regt, of a son.

19. At Masulpatam, the lady of Lieut. Odeil,

25th N.I., of a daughter.

21. At Bangalore, the lady of Capt. B. M'Mas ter, dep. assist. adj. gen. Mysore division, of a daughter.

23. At Chicacole, the lady of Major J. Oglivie, 34th or Chicacole L. Inf., of a son. 26. At Trichinopoly, the lady of Capt. Fulton, dep. assist. qu. mast. gen southern division, of a daughter. daughter.

daughter.

26. The lady of the Venerable Archdeacon Vaughan, of a daughter.

20. At Mangalore, the lady of Capt. S. Hughes, 50th N.I., of a son.

30. At Cocanadah, the lady of J. T. Anstey, Esq., civil service, of a son.

Oct. 1. The lady of R. Sladen, Esq., medical storekeeper, of twin som.

4. The lady of Licut. Col. Geo. Cadell, of a daughter.

daughter. a. At Nellore, the lady of E. Smalley, Esq., of a daughter.

9. Mrs. Geo. Taylor, of a son.

MARRIAGES.

MARKIAGES.

S-pt. 8. At Mangalore, John Gunning, Esq., 17th N.I., son of the late Sir G. W. Guming, Bart, of Horton, Northamptonshire, to desist Milar, daughter of the Rev. C. M. Babington, rector of Peterston, Herefordshie, 12. At Bangalore, Lieut. A. J. Begbie, Madras artillery, to Eliza Ann, eldest daughter of Major John Wilson, 13th N.I. 26. At St. George's Church, A. J. Cherry, Esq., Madras civil service, to Georgiana, fourth daughter of E. J. Gascolgne, Esq., master attendant at Madras.

- At the Black-town Chapel, Mr. W. Mead, to Ann, only daughter of Mr. J. Dick, druggist. - At the Black-town Chapel, Mr. P. P. Kroon to Miss F. W. Hicken.

Oct. 8. At Masulipatam, M. Walker, Esq., of the 16th Lancers, eldest son of Rear Admiral Wal-ker, to Fanny Matlida, eldest daughter of Thos. Welch, Esq., of Harley Street.

DEATHS. Aug. 12. In camp, near Beeswarah, Capt. John Sinciair, 29th N.I., commanding 1st hattalion pioneers.

pioneers.

Sept. 9. At Secunderabad, the lady of Capt. R.
C. Cuxton, 19th N.I.
15. At Bellatronsee, on route from Bellary to Belgaum, with the right wing of H. M.'s 41st regt., Colour Serj. N. Allen, after a few hours attack of choiera:—also, on the 23d, Colour Serj. J. Tucker, of the same corps, of a similar attack of choiera.
17. Capt. W. M. Hanwell, of the ship David Malcolm.
20. At Secunderabad, Mrs. Augusta Lamoury.
21. At Vizianagrum, Ensign F. B. M'Leod,
12th N.I.

Mr. D. Calder, market serjeant, ared 41.

12th N.I.

— Mr. D. Calder, market serjeant, aged 41.

23. Hormajee Ediljee Ponday, a most respectable Parsee inhabitant of Madras, aged 50.

27. At Vepery, Clara Elizabeth, wife of the Rev. Dr. J. P. Rottler, aged 74.

28. At Ramnad, Mr. Thomas Taylor, surveyor, and to

28. At Ramnad, Mr. 1 nomas 1 a) 16, 16, 29, 29, 29, 20, 19. Anne, wife of Mr. Geo. Taylor, aged 22. 11. Mr. J. A. Fitzsimons, aged 21. Lately. On board the George, off the coast of Brail, Sarah, daughter of the late Wm. Baker, Esq., of Walton Le Seken, county of Essex, aged 22.

Bombay.

GOVERNMENT GENERAL ORDERS.

FORT OF ASSERBHUR.

Bombay Castle, July 31, 1827 .- The Hon, the Governor in Council is pleased to direct that the designation of "Garririson Staff' Officer" at Asseerghur be changed to that of " Fort Adjutant."

GUIDES TO TROOPS.

Bombay Castle, Aug. 13, 1827.—The Hon. the Governor in Council is pleased to direct, that whenever guides shall be employed by troops marching through the country, they be paid at the rate of a cutcha pyse per mile, or a pucka pyse per coss.

KNAPSACKS TO TROOPS.

Bombay Castle, Aug. 16, 1827 .- The Hon, the Governor in Council is pleased to abolish the present regulation which restricts the issue of knapsacks to troops in the field only, and directs that each man, whether in garrison or in the field, be allowed to receive from the public stores a knapsack complete with slings of brown tanned leather every four years, to be replaced at the expense of the men if rendered unserviceable within a shorter period, except on proof of unavoidable accident or loss on service, of which the commanding officer will be expected to afford satisfactory explanation.

The knapsacks to be painted, and the year and quarter in which it may be issued to be stamped on each knapsack, which marks are to be duly noticed in any proceedings of committees of survey.

The preceding order is applicable both to European and native troops.

ALLOWANCES TO THTERINARY SURGBOWN

Bombay Castle, Aug. 27, 1827 .- With the view of equalizing the pay and allowances at present drawn by the veterinary surgeon in his Majesty's cavalry regiment on this establishment, with those of the veterinary surgeons in the Hon. Company's service, the Hon. the Governor in Council is pleased to direct that gratuity at the established rate be granted to the former from the 20th of March last.

BARODA INDEPENDENT COMPANY.

Bombay Castle, Aug. 29, 1827 .- The Hon, the Governor in Council is pleased to direct that the Baroda Independent Company be abolished from the 1st October next, and that all guards required by the residency be furnished from the canton. ment in the same manner as was done before the formation of the Independent Company. The officer commanding the escort will revert to his former footing.

The native officers and men who were formerly received from the line, are to be again transferred to such regiments as his Excellency the Commander-in-chief may be pleased to direct, and the remainder discharged.

Rajcote, in Kattywar, is to be considered a garrison station from the same period.

The offices of deputy commissary of stores in the Poona and Surat divisions of the army are to be abolished from the same date.

EUROPEAN TRAVELLERS.

Bombay Castle, Sept. 1, 1827 .- The Hon, the Governor in Council having reason to believe, from various reports lately submitted for his information, that European travellers are often subjected to privations in passing through the country, which might be obviated were the intention of the orders of government, as published under date 15th of December 1820, rescinding Regulation VIII. of 1814, better understood; is pleased to declare, that although the orders had in view the protection of the inhabitants against compulsory service, yet it never was intended (as has been erroneously supposed) to encourage them to withhold needful supplies of provisions, forage, and firewood, or other assistance within their power, either to troops or to single travellers. He is therefore pleased to direct that magistrates and collectors will adopt means for making the regulations fully understood throughout their districts, by causing printed translations of the rules now in force regarding the march of troops and of single travellers to be posted up at the public cutchery of every native village, on the line of march generally traversed by troops and single European travellers, and hy such other methods as may appear to them best calculated for the purpose of giving general information.

It is expected by the Hon, the Governor in Council that officers proceeding with troops and single travellers will provide for their march at the commencement by engaging carts or other conveyance for their baggage for the whole distance, or to certain large towns on the route; but as cases may arise to prevent this, or accidents happen against which it may have been impossible to provide, and as the collectors are well acquainted with the resources of their districts in respect to provisions and other needful supplies, as well as with the number of carts and other conveyances belonging to every village within their collectorates, and whether kept for hire or entirely for agricultural purposes, also with the various castes of men of which the population is composed, the Governor in Council considers that their assistance and that of the native public servants under their authority would often be beneficial in procuring supplies and conveyances to small detachments of troops and to single travellers, without the necessity of resorting to any compulsory measures whatever; and he trusts that every magistrate and collector will feel disposed to contribute towards the comfort of troops and of single travellers passing through their limits without interfering in the least with the freedom of the inhabitants.

The country people, being in general unaccustomed to furnish supplies to European travellers, otherwise than through the medium of the village authorities, patels, and other government servants, should be enjoined to be civil and attentive to them, especially to such as are proceeding upon sick certificate, and that they should be furnished with price lists. rates of hire, and mode of payment, also with such rules as may be deemed expedient, from time to time, for the information and observance of strangers.

As much depends upon the conduct of the petty native village authorities, whether supplies and conveyances are furnished or withheld, it is desirable that the manner in which they act towards travellers should be frequently brought under the cognizance of the magistrates and collectors, and that they should be subjected to penalties for wilful and gross misbe-haviour and neglect of duty to European travellers, equally as they are for transgression against the regulation of the inhabitants in their persons and property.

The Governor in Council trusts that these regulations will not be construed to extend beyond what may reasonably be expected in the way of attention and in aid of the march of troops and single travellers, and induce officers to think themselves entitled to more than what the magistrates and collectors, from the information they possess of the resources and circumstances of the country, and in reference to what, is due to the ryots and general interests, conceive can be properly afforded; nor is it intended that these regulations should lead officers to expect more in the way of attention from the village authorities than what may be reasonably required and fully authorized by the magistrates.

Single travellers are to be furnished with certificates from the officers commanding their regiments, or a staff officer of the station from which they take their departure, of their having commenced their march perfectly equipped, with proper and serviceable cattle or other carriage (stating the number and description) for the conveyance of their baggage, and in case of any casualty occurring which may render it necessary to solicit the aid of the civil power, these certificates must be produced.

MILITARY INSANE PATIENTS.

Bombay Castle, Sept. 4, 1827 .- The Hon. the Governor in Council is pleased to rescind that part of the general order of the 11th of February 1825 (No. 61), which prescribes that military insane patients be sent to the civil asylum nearest to the station where the corps may be serving: and directs that in future all such patients be sent to the asylum at the presidency.

MILITARY APPOINTMENTS. PROMOTIONS, &c.

Bombay Castle, July 30.—Capt. B. McMahon, 25th N.I., placed at disposal of resident of In-

Aug. 9.—3d N.I. Ens. C. Birdwood to be lieut., v. Clarkson dec.; dated 3d Aug. 1827.

V. Chinson uec.; dated on Aug. 1021.

Officers employed on Revenue Survey of Gugrat placed at: disposal of Com.in.chief. Lieut W.

Keys, 5th N. I.; Lieut W. Reynolds, 12th do.;

Lieut P. M. Melville, 7th do.; Lieut J. S. Down, 1st Gr. Regt; Lieut D. D. Davidson, 17th N.I.;

Lieut R. Stark, 1st Gr. Regt.

Lieut. R. Stark, 1st Gr. Regt.

Aug. 11.—Cadates C. J. Cuttis and C. A. Echalaz, admitted to infantry, and prom. to ensigns.

Aug. 13.—Cadet W. B. C. Roberts admitted to cavalty, and prom. to cornet.—Cadet F. Pelly admitted to engineers, and prom. to 2cl-lieut.—Cadets T. R. Stewart, John Sinclair, and R. T. Stephenson, admitted to infantry, and prom. to ensigns.—Mr. Jos. Bowstead admitted an assist, surg.

292, M. E. Cont. 23d N.I. Ens. S. Parr to be licut, v. Barlow dec., dated 4th Aug. 1827.
Aug. 14.—18th N.I. Ens. J. E. Frederick to be licut., v. Pelly dismissed; dated 29th July 1827.

Cadet Wm. Topham admitted to infantry, and prom. to ensign.

Aug. 15.—Infuntry. Sen. Maj. P. Fearon to be lieut. col., v. Sandwith prom.; dated 2d April 1827. Gth N.I. Capt. R. Taylor to be maj., Lieut. J. Fawcett to be capt., and Ens. W. Thatcher to be lieut., in suc. to Fearon, prom. 2d April 1827.

Aug. 16.—Ensigns reposted. W. E. Rawlinson, to 2d Europ. regt.; T. Stock, 23d N.I.; S. H. Par-tridge, 18th do.

MISCELLANEOUS

-ad-Liebts. H. W. Brett, J. C. Unwin, and Thos. Tartion posted to regiment of artillery. Cornets (recently grows) posted to Regis. W. Ha-Cornets (recently prom.) posted to Regte, W. Hamilton, to 1st L.C.; W. A. Hamilton, 2d do.; W. F. Hay, 3d do.

F. Hay, 3d do.

**Reague** (recently prom.) posted to Regts. GeoDump, to 3d N.I.; H. S. Gunter, 3d E. regt.; W.
Baker, 1st Gr. regt.; S. Macan, 17th N.I.; R. D.
Sthant, 14th do.; C. C. Cam., do.; E. Andrews, 2th do.; J. C. Bate, 11th do.; J. W. Hockin, 18th do.; F. Cristall, 8th do.; W. S. Nettlefold, 3d do.; P. Shaw, 22d do.; T. Nelson, 21st do.; W.
Johrson, 20th do.; J. W. Renney, 18th do.; H. J.
Woodward, 1st E. regt.; W. C. Mitchell, 13th
Woodward, 1st E. regt.; W. C. Mitchell, 13th
W. J. Eastwrick, 12th do.; R. Hudson, 2d Gr.
W. J. Eastwrick, 12th do.; R. Hudson, 2d Gr.
N.I.; B. J. Holmes, 26th N.I.; N. Godiln, 18th do.; C. R. Hogg. 2d E. regt.; J. Burnett, 1st Gr.
N.I.; R. J. Holmes, 26th N.I.; T. L. Frederick, 28th do.

Aug. 17.—23d N.I. Lieut. E. P. Ramsay to be adj., v. Barlow dec.; dated 4th Aug. 1827. Lieut. P. T. French to be qu. mast. and interp. in Hindootanee, v. Ramsay; do. do.

Oct. 1.—Maj. J. Griffiths to be commissary of stores at presidency, v. Pierce proceeding to Europe. Capt. J. Barton to be agent for manufacture of gunpowder, v. Griffiths.

DOOAB FIELD FORCE.

The following arrangements for brigading the field force in the Dooab have been ordered, and to have effect from date of junction of troops composing the force; dated 9th Oct. 1827.

Artillery. C. Troop 2d brigade Madras horse artillery; G. company of Golundauze bat.—Maj. W. F. Brett, to command; Lieut. T. Whirther, to be Caralry Brigade. 4th Madras L.C.; 7th Madras L.C.—Lieut. Col. S. Martin, to command; Capt. A. Kerr, 7th regt., to be brigade major; Lieut. T. Anderson, 4th regt., to be brigade qu. master.

Int Inf. Brigade. H.M.; 41st foot; 49th Madras N.I.—Lleut. Col. M. Riddell, to command; Capt. G. Hutchinson (brig. maj. at Kulladghee), to be brigade major; Lieut. E. Roberts, 49th regt., to be brigade qu. master.

2d Inf. Brigade. 1st Bombay Europ. regt.; 23d Madras L. Inf.; flank companies 44th Madras N.I.—Lieut. Col. E. Frederick to command; Capt. T. Welland, 23d regt., to be brigade major; Capt. (Baron) Kutseben, 44th regt., to be brigade quantater.

Oct. 9. — Temporary appointments confirmed. Capt. J. Cocke, 3d N.I., to act as inapector of hill forts in Deccan during employment of Capt. A. W. Browne on regimental duty.—Lieut. W. Capt. A. L. to take charge of brigade major's office in Cutch, on departure of Capt. Aitchison to join troops it. Southern Concan.—Lieut. D. M. Scoble, 14th N.I., to act as brigade major is Southern Concan until arrival of officer appointed to station.—Lieut. G. Stirling, II. M.'s 2d regt., to act as adj. to light bat formed at Poons, v. Johnson, prom. to a comp.—Lieut, J. H. Chambers, 4th N.I., to act as adj. to wing proceeding on field service while detached from head-quarters.

1st or Gr. N.I. Lieut, R. Stark to be qu. mast, and interp. in Hindoostanee; dated 1st Oct. 1827, 25th N.I. Lieut, H. C. Teasdale to be qu. mast, and interp. in Hindoostanee; dated ditto.

Capt. J. Sutherland, 2d L.C., 1st assist to resident at Delhi, to command Nizam's Reformed Horse, in suc. to. late Maj. Davies.

FURLOUGHS.

To Europe.—July 30. Assist Surg. John Goss, for health.—Aug. 9. Ens. H. S. Watkins, 15th N.I., for health.—Oct. 1. Lieut. Col. F. H. Pierce, regt. of artil.—5. Maj. W. Morrison, 18th N.I., for health.

107 neath.

To Sea.—Aug. 9. Capt. J. Pew, 40th Madras
N.I., for health.—13. Lleut.-W. A. Miller, Madras
Rife Corps, for health.—15. Lieut. G. A. Hughes, Lyth N.I., for health.—17. Assists Surg. G. Smith, Joth N.I., for health.—23. Lleut. H. AssourJoth N.I., for health.

THE THEATRE

The Bombay Theatre owes its origin to an earlier period than any theatre in India. It was built by subscription about the year 1770, and up to 1818 had been barely maintained by the funds raised by occasional representations. At this period, when the house was about to become a complete ruin, and lost for ever as a source of amusement to the society, a liberal subscription was raised, which enabled the managers to rebuild nearly the whole of the theatre, and to improve the interior decorations in a style worthy of any provincial stage in England. The funds raised on this occasion were not. however, equal to the expenses incurred, added to the debt of the old theatre, which was very considerable, and great difficulties attendant on amateur representations have hitherto prevented the managers from redeeming the full amount of the debt incurred. The Bombay Theatre has often been the means of contributing most large. ly to objects of charity, and we are assured that if it were relieved of its embarrassments, the surplus profits of the house would in future be entirely devoted to such purposes -Iris, Aug. 17.

After the performance, last Thursday, of " Giovanni in London," the amateur, who performed Leporello, gave us his own and Yates's " Reminiscences, or Etchings of Life and Character." This sketch opens with recollections of his school days; he was at Charter House, and his stay there was, like that of other boys, only remarkable for black eyes, bloody noses, sky blue, red knuckles, and "some pecuniary difficulty in the apple market." Near the school was an old cobler "Nathaniel," who piqued himself on correcting the boys' mis-pronounciation. Carter-house, from Magna Carta, Nat maintained was the real orthoepy, and not Charter-house. Mo' (from the Freuch) for mob, &c. &c. From the school, the amateur took us to his cousin, Mr. Damper, who gives him a friendly lecture on life. Mr. Damper, as may be inferred from his name, always looked on the black side of things. The boy is shockingly grown up; the professions are all objectionable - the army, "five shillings a day for heing that at,"—the navy, "a midshipman at forty,"—the stage, "picking pockets, or deing the ri-diculous in a barn." This character was admirably hit off, and no less successful was the representation of Mrs. Paulina Pry, mother to the great Paul Pry. She, it appears, had a method of dipping into private affairs with her chin, insinuating a faux pas with her nose, and of throwing her eyes out and drawing them in again " like a snail's horn." The amateur goes to France, and having bought a tea-pot, which he is not allowed to bring, he hits upon a singular expedient, viz. that of carrying the tea-pot in his hand, and every moment applying it to his mouth, asserting that it is necessary to his existence, The inference drawn by the French custom-house officer is, that the East India Company's officers (of whom the amateur is one) are so fond of tea that they always carry a tea-pot with them.—Ibid.

THE KUBBEESA.

The controversy amongst the Parsees respecting the Kubbeesa (referred to in p. 277) still continues. We subjoin the following remarks on the subject from the Iris of August 28:—

Religious controversy is generally uninteresting, but there are some distinguishing characteristics in that between the Shersayans and the Churiguryans to which we wish to draw the attention of our readers. That discussion has no relation to forms and modes of faith, or to mere speculative doctrines, but involves a matter of fact seemingly capable of demonstration: the advocates of either side do not maintain their tenets by the aid of uncertain traditions only; but profess to refer to history; and thus the dispute, though perhaps interminable, is not at first view manifestly absurd.

Again, we would draw the reader's attention to the temperate and judicious manner in which, at the present period, this question has been canvassed, and to the light thrown thereby on the customs and character of the Parsees. Though both parties be somewhat enthusiastic, yet their enthusiasm seems only to render them more ardent in the pursuit of truth: an anomaly in religious quarrels partly to be ascribed to the nature of the inquiry, which being apparently reasonable, in-clines the disputants to listen to reason, and which does not admit of bigotry and superstition, terms which imply an incapacity duly to employ the understanding; but we think it is chiefly owing to there being, in this case, no artificial, as there is no natural, connexion between politics and religion. To there being neither penalties nor rewards attendant on belief or disbelief, and consequently no prejudice or bias inconsistent with the purity of religion is excited either by the hope of advantage or the dread of persecution. Thus, if a determination could be formed upon the subject, the dispassional conduct of the parties would leave no doubt that the dispute would soon be at an end, and the absurdity of appealing to Mr. Elphinstone would not appear to be so great. If there were apparent grounds from which a conclusion might be drawn, reference to an impartial man of talent, capable of deep research, and possessing the reasoning faculty, could not be deemed inexpedient; but, in the present instance, Mr. Elphinistone would of course decline the profifered honour; for though bett sides admin his ability to do all that can be done in such a case, he would-perceive that every effort to reconcile the disputants must be ineffectual. The schism has existed for ages, which proves that the grounds for a determination must be dubious, otherwise the question would ere now have been determined; and time, though in one sense called the parent of truth, renders vain every attempt to pierce the obscurity which involves the remote customs and history of nations.

It is imagined by some Europeans that the Parsees are a superstitious race, in a manner enslaved by their priesthood, and by a few individuals constituting a pun-chayet, who assume to act as leaders or arbiters in temporal and spiritual affairs. The dissension which now exists among them is sufficient to refute this error. The priests, with one exception, by no means appear in the front of the battle, and are not occupied in fomenting the passions of the opponents. There seems to be no surrender of the good sense of the many to the guidance of a few, and no wealthy Parsee appears to have the power to dictate: hence, though we lament that the Parsees should have now revived so hopeless a discussion as that about the Kubbeesa, we cannot but approve the motives which led to that revival and the conduct of the parties in the dispute.

EARTHQUAKE.

A smart shock of an earthquake was felt for some distance along the Malabar coast about noon on Wednesday the 228 ult. At Vingorla, in the Southern Concan, the atmosphere had been remarkably clear all the morning, but there the tremour of the earth was greatest: the bungalows were shaken violently, and the inmates, afraid they would topple on their heads, rushed simultaneously into the open air. The shaking continued nearly a quarter of a minute, and was accompanied by the same hollow rumbling noise, resembling thunder, that distinguished the carthquake experienced in Cutch in 1819. which occasioned such dreadful devastation, and was felt on this island. The thermometer did not rise higher than 79° the whole of the day .- Bom. Gaz., Sept. 5.

KOLAPORE.

During the last four months repeated runours have been circulated respecting the warlike preparations of that insolent and refractory chief the Rajah of Kołapore. It is said that he has collected around him upwards of seven or eight thousand men, and has already committed several petty depredations both on the Hon. Company's, and the Sattara Rajah's territories. Our brave fellows are of course on the alert, and pant to get once for all fairly at him. We are even told that the officers of one distinguished corps are seldom to be seen without a single stick in their hands, so eager are they to crack the crowns of the Kolaporekur's redoubted champions. But seriously speaking, it is a pity that so much forbearance has been shown to that turbulent character. The Rajah has expressed a wish, it is said, to visit the celebrated temple of Dewee Bhowanee at Tooljapoor in the Nizam's territories-if this be the case, he has of course met with a peremptory refusal. The cause of his fits of devotion are now too well known to blind the Bombay go-He became wonderfully devernment. vout last year, and over-persuaded the authorities to let him go to Jeejoory, a famed place of Hindoo worship near Poonah; but he soon showed that his real object was to get to Poonah, where his time was spent in one scene of gross debauchery, turbulence, and excessive vio-So little hope do we entertain of his ultimate reformation, as sincerely to trust he may soon swell up the full measure of his crimes, and thus draw down on his head that fearful vengeance that strikes terror into the souls of such bullies -and which seems imperatively called for .- Bom. Gaz., Sept. 5.

TWO NEW MEN-OF-WAR.

We understand that orders have been received from England to construct two ships for H.M.'s navy in the dock-yard of Bombay; one of 84 guns, to be called the Calcutta, and the other, a 46 gun frigate, the Manilla.—Bom. Cour., Sept. 8.

MEETING OF NATIVES.

The following is an abstract report of the proceedings at a numerous and respectable meeting of the native inhabitants of Bombay, held in the library of the Native Education Society, August 28, 1827, The meeting was opened by Madhowdas Runchoddas, who took the chair. At the suggestion of the chairman the object of the meeting was explained in the English, Maratha, Goojrathee, and Persian languages, viz. "to come to a resolution on the most appropriate method of attesting the affectionate and respectful sentiments of the native community towards the Hon. Mountstuart Elphinstone, on his leaving the government of Bombay, over which he has presided for the last eight years, with so much virtue, ability, and integrity, accompanied with such invariable courtesy, kindness, and generosity."

The native gentlemen present then proceeded to discuss the various methods of carrying into effect their object, when it was at length moved by the chairman, seconded by Framjee Cawasjee, and unanimously resolved:

That the most astisfactory and durable plan of carrying their wishes into effect is by accumulating a fund of money, to be vested in government securities; from the interest of which, according to its amount, one or more professorships (to be held by gentlemen from Great Britain until the happy period arrive when natives shall be fully competent to hold them) be established, under the Bombay Native Education Society, for teaching the English language, the arts, sciences, and literature of Europe; and that these professorships. in compliment to the person in reference to whom the meeting has been convened, be denominated "The Elphinstone Professorships," with the reservation however from the principal subscribed of a sufficient sum of money to defray the expense of a portrait of Mr. Elphinstone, to be placed in the library of the Native Education Society.

That the subscription paper, together with a copy of the proceedings of the meeting, be circulated among the native inhabitants of Bombay, for further containations, and that it be sent to the outstations for the same purpose.

That a committee of native gentlemen be formed to carry these resolutions into effect, and to report to the subscribers when the measures proposed are sufficiently matured to enable them to hand up the address and resolutions to the Hon. Mountstuart Elphinstone; and that Capt. Jervis be requested to afford his aid as secretary to the committee.

A subscription was immediately opened, and the sum of 52,276 rupees subscribed by the persons present, amongst whom Framjee Cawasjee Banajee and Jemshedjee Jeejeebhoy gave 7,000 rupees each,

ASSAULT OF A BRITISH JUDGE.

A Bombay native paper gives this article of news: The following novel circumstance occurred at Ahmedabad, on the 12th Sept. Mr. Bell, the judge of that station, visited the jail as usual, to inspect the prisoners, accompanied by a mehta and two peons. They had scarcely entered the jail, when the prisoners surrounded them, closed the inner door of the jail, seized Mr. Bell and the peons, whose hands they tied: they then cast the noose of a rope about Mr. Bell's neck, and began to hang him. Before they could stop his breath Mr. Bell called loudly to the sepoy-quards, who promptly came to his relief, and rescued him from his perilous condition. The prisoners were riotous, and it became necessary to have recomps course to coercive measures to restore tranquillity, which was not effected, however, before the jailer was wounded. This event has created a great sensation amongst the inhabitants of Ahmedahad.

LOST GAIETY OF BOMBAY.

Twas in the olden time—our Bombay rag Commenced at day-light, spite of fogs or daw, Assembling such a group of merry faces And buoyant spirits-'twas delight to view ! The old race-booth, though mean to outward ken,

Had such a galaxy of brilliant eyes in, As roused the ardour of our sporting men, ('Tis beauty's smile the genuine spirit lies in Of all our joys) and calling Cupid's aid in Many who lost the race-vet won the maiden.

Hali! rising sun-who sees him rise must feel; Like every living creature 'neath the moon, An effervescence o'er his spirits steal, Unlike the ennui of an afternoon-And thus the scene was one of mirth and frolic. A perfect carnival-each heart elate;

The losers never look'd as they'd the cholic, For people little cared who won the plate-Our races were not what Newmarket Jews meant: But gentlemanly racing for amusement.

All was conducted with a liberal spirit, To make it to the public interesting: T' exclude a horse for errors of a minute. We should have surely thought the stewards jesting-

The hospitable people near the spot Gave public breakfasts-'twas a joyous meai! A scene of pleasure ne'er to be forgot; The band-but striking up a dance or reel, "The Bobbery Hunt's Delight," or " Garree

Was sure to set the nimble feet a-going.

All's over † early racing-breakfasts-all! Gone-like "The Bobbery Hunt" and " Sans Souci:"

Yet what mementos do the names recall Of spirits " blotted from the things that be"-For though "the bobbery," when in search of

Were terrors to Old Crones and yelping Pyes; Convivial friendship will preserve their name, As those who bade her brightest fires arise; -And but once more to hear their bugle strain, Bombay, might rouse thee to be gay again.

Bomb. Gaz.

GUZERAT.

By letters from Guzerat, dated 28th Sept., we are informed that the monsoon has been one of the heaviest, and, at the same time, one of the most agreeable rainy seasons, that has occurred for several years. The earthquake which was felt to the south was also perceived by the natives in the north, and, in conjunction with the rain, has demolished an unusual number of huts, walls, old buildings, &c. The whole country for miles and miles around is said to be in ear, and there is every prospect of a most abundant harvest, as neither locusts, rats, nor killing colds have yet made their appearance. The coolies and other disturbers of Asiatic Journ. Vol.25. No.147.

the public peace have been little heard of. Sickness, too, the bane of the climate. has scarce commenced; and the cholera has now been so many months absent as almost to be forgotten in Guzerat .- Iris, Oct. 9.

SHIPPING. Arrivals.

Articals.

Aug. 2. Palambam. Nash, from Liverpool.—i3
Crown, Baird, from Liverpool.—28. Mountaineer, Canney, from London.—28. Bolton, Clarkson, from London.—29. Competitor, Jackson, from London.—31. Dublin, Stewart, from Liverpool.—
Sept. 1. Calamont, Honor, from Greenock; and Mary, Beachcroft, from London.—11. Cipda,
Scott, from Liverpool.—15. La Calase, Parkerieux, from Bordeaux.—19. Katherine Steugar
Porbes, Chapman, from London.—20. Pomona, Hughes, from Liverpool.—Oct. 5. Victor, Dunhae, from Bourbon.—9. Dorothy, Garnock, from Liverpool.

Departures.

Aug. 12. Egyptian, Lilburn, for London,—26.
Enterprize, Edmonds, for Madras.—Sept. 9. Esther, Robinson, for London.—16. Palambam, Nash, for Greenock.—19. John Bigar, Kent, for Mangadore and Calcutta.—23. Dubtin, Stewart, for Alipee and Liverpool.—0.ct. & Mountaineer, Canney, for London; and Croon, Baird, for Greenock.—7. Charles Kerr, Brodle, for Alipee, Cape of Good Hope, and London.—9. Mary, Beacheroft, for Cape of Good Hope and London.—11. Cipde, Scott, for Liverpool.—14. Pomora, Hughes, for Liverpool.

BIRTHS.

June 13. At Pangim, Gos, the lady of B. W. Gautier, Esq., late of the Hon. E. I. Company's military service on this establishment, of a daughter.

July 21. At Mhow, the lady of Lieut H. II. Doherty, 18th B. N. I., of a son and heir.

Aug. 12. Mrs. Mulholland, wife of Mr. B. Mulholland, mint department, of a daughter.

— Mrs. T. Gardiner, of a still-born male child. 13. At the Court House, Mrs. Jefferies, of a daughter.

daugnter.

14. At Byculla, Mrs. Flower, of a daughter.

— At Tannah, the lady of John Williams, Eaq., civil service, of a son.

19. The lady of Geo. Moore, Esq., Madras civil

13. Inc listy of Geo. Money, Eq., making strong service, of a son.
27. Mrs. G. Tedman, of a son.
— In the fort, the lady of Luis F. da Silva, Ksq., daughter of Sir Roger de Faria, of a daughter.

Sept. 19. At Rajcote, the lady of Capt. Holland, 3d assist. com gen., of a daughter.
25. At Malwath, the lady of Ens. Lewis, 22d regt., of a son.
Cet. 2. Mrs. G. W. Scales, of a son.
4. At Bycullah, Mrs. T. Cooke, of a son.

MARRIAGES.

Aug. 18. Mr. J. A. Higgs, to Miss Harriet Arden.

23. Mr. W. Linguard, to Miss C. Scott.
Ort. 4. Capt. F. Hickes, N.I., to Anne Barlow, second daughter of R. Foquett, Esq., Clattaford, Isle of Wight.

DEATHS.

Aug. 9. At Surat, Lleut. J. F. Bordwine, of the corps of engineers.
20. At Malligaum, of jungle fever, Lleut. J. Beck, 21st N.I., and adjutant of the Bheel Corps, Candelsh.

Candelsh.

25. After a sudden illness of little more than one hour, in his 48th year, Soonderbut Smarth, a Hindoo high priest of Bombay.

Oct. I. At Baroda, of fever, Capt. Goo. Edsall, commanding 15th N.I.

7. Lieut. G. Richardson, 7th N.I., aged 19.

8. Lieut. Col. H. Scott, H.M.'s 6th regt., and commanding the garrison of Bombay.

3. Y.

3 F

Ceylon.

AMERICAN MISSION AT JAPPNA.

The first report of the American Missionary Seminary at Jaffna has appeared. It contains a very encouraging account of the progress of the plan adopted by the American missionaries to familiarize the native youth with English science and literature, preparatory to the propagation of Christianity amongst them.

" The way for the formation of a seminary," says the report, " had been in a degree prepared by the establishment, somewhat extensively, of native free schools; and more especially by that of charity boarding schools, connected with the families of the mission, in which a large number of children and youth, taken from their friends and placed directly under the control of the missionaries, were early laying the foundation for such an acquaintance with the English language as would open to them the road to European science, and were acquiring such habits of study and such a knowledge of their own language, as would enable them to bring to light the fancied or real treasures of Tamul literature. Provision had been made for the support and instruction of a considerably larger number of such children and youth than, on account of the inconvenience of carrying them forward in separate schools at the five different stations of the mission, had actually been taken. The system, however, by which the children of heathen parents were brought under the influence of a Christian education, in the midst of idolaters, was evidently most promis-ing as to its results, and could not be abandoned. It seemed to demand rather completion in the establishment of a higher seminary, for which it had prepared the way."

Accordingly, in 1824, the system of instruction upon a larger scale was commenced, in the elements of grammar, arithmetic, and astronomy in the English language, combined with instruction in Tamul. The natives were clamorous for their children being received upon the foundation, making no objection to their eating and drinking upon the premises, thereby sacrificing their religious scruples to the desire of securing an education for their offspring. " At a public examination in the Tamul language, in June last, essays were produced; among others, on the following subjects: the form and dimensions of the earth-the atmospheremotion of the earth-number, distance, and size of primary planets—eclipses—method of finding the latitude at sea—and the fixed stars. Some of these subjects were illustrated by the help of instruments, and by presenting coloured maps and drawings made by the students, much to the astonishment of a respectable matter audience. It is not to be understood, however, that the students were by any means deeply versed in the sciences touched upon, but they evince a very tolerable acquaintance with the particular points discussed in their essays."

The college, or hall, as it is termed, is of small dimensions, pleasantly situated on the mission premises at Batticotta. It has been named Outley-Hall, out of compliment to Sir Richard Ottley, the puisne judge of the Supreme Court of Ceylon, who has been a liberal contributor to the institution. Its library consists of 600 volumes, a philosophical apparatus, &c.

"As evidence of a predominating Christian influence in the seminary, it may be added, that a Bible society has been formed, to which all the students belong. If, then, the direct influence of such a system of Christian education on the pupils themselves, and the more important and extended indirect influence, through them, upon the thousands of heathen around, among whom they may become burning and shining lights, is considered, the prospect cannot but be regarded as full of hope and promise, and such as may well inspire not only continued, but greatly increased exertions."

MARRIAGE.

Sept. 29. At Colombo, R. M. Sneyd, Esq., provincial judge of Galle and Matura, to Henrietta Charlotta, chic's daughter of C. E. Layard, Esq., collector of Colombo.

DEATHS.

Sept. 7. At Trincomalee, Edw. Muskett, Esq., of the firm of Winter and Co., Colombo.

11. At Colombo, Mr. Wm. Gunn, watch-maker, aged 27.

Penang.

By the arrival on the 8th August of the H. C.'s ship Waterloo, Capt. Manning, from England, the long expected charter for the incorporated settlements reached this island. On the following morning at ten o'clock the Hon, the Governor and Resident Councillor having assembled, in order to receive Sir John Thomas Claridge, Knt., Recorder of the Court of Judicature established for Prince of Wales' Island, Singapore, and Malacca, proceeded with Sir John Thomas Claridge to the court-house, and having severally taken their seats on the bench and the prescribed oaths, his Majesty's letters-patent establishing the Courts of Judicature of Prince of Wales' Island, Singapore, and Malacca, dated the 27th day of November 1826, were then delivered over by the Recorder to the Hon. the Governor, and publicly read under a royal salute.

Alexand John Kerr, Esq. was afterwards appointed registrar under the charter, until further orders, and took the necessary oaths therein prescribed .- Penang Register.

BIRTHS.

July 11. The lady of Capt. Blundell, commanding artillery, of a daughter.
13. Mrs. Berlle, of a son.
16. The lady of Baron D'Albedyhll, late Netherlands resident at Surat, of a daughter.

MARRIAGE.

July 17. J. L. Geddes, Esq., assist. surg. 25th Madras N.I., to Nancy, third daughter of the late Rev. W. A. Keating.

DEATHS.

April 17. Lieut. Christopher Keating, 46th N.I. Aug. 27. Two days after her arrival from Ma-dras, Mrs. Amelia Lefevre, eldest daughter of Mr. Francis Lamoury.

Singapore.

DOGS.

The war against the canine community of the settlement is prosecuted with vigour, and individuals of the obnoxious race may frequently be seen writhing beneath the spear, presenting to those who delight in contemplating the pangs and convulsions of animal suffering, objects well calculated to gratify so amiable a propensity. Pariah dogs we are aware are generally considered a nuisance, and if they are so it is fit they should be destroy-Their death however, if they were not a nuisance before, infallibly makes them one if their bodies are not properly disposed of; the neglect of which in the present instance has created an evil which may literally be said to "stink in the nostrils" of this people-we mean the effluyia arising from the decomposition of dead dogs upon the banks of the river, the beach, and elsewhere. Some gentlemen cultivating spices will perhaps offer a grave for the carcases of the slain-a better or cheaper manure could not be; and should there be any lurking fear that the crop might taste of dog, it may be dissipated by reflecting that lands on the coast of Cornwall are sometimes manured with pilchards, but that the corn has never yet been known to savour of fish .- Sing. Chron., Aug. 16.

RAFFLES CLUB.

On the 6th July the Raffles Club gave their anniversary dinner, at which Mr. Prince, our resident, presided. This being the first meeting since the melancholy decease of Sir Stamford Raffles, the founder and vigilant friend of our settlement, whose services and exertions for its welfare must ever command the grateful recollections of its inhabitants, after the usual patriotic toasts, the president gave "the memory of our lamented friend Sir Stamford Raffles," which was drank in silence. The health of Lady Raffles and her infant daughter, of the Hon. the Governor and family, and other appropriate toasts followed; and at about ten o'clock Mr. Prince quitted the chair, shortly after which the party broke up. On this occasion the club, in deference to the memory of the deceased, deviated from their usual practice of giving a ball and supper in the evening. The banqueting-room was splendidly and tastefully illuminated, and the whole arrangements did infinite credit to the stewards .- Singapore Chron. .

Malacca.

EDUCATION.

In our last we had the pleasure of recording a further instance of the interest taken by government in the education of youth, by noticing that the Hon. the Governor had granted a monthly allowance of 100 Spanish dollars to the Malacca Free School; we have now the additional satisfaction of stating, that a grant to the same amount has been made by government to the Anglo-Chinese college. The value of this liberal grant is greatly enhanced by the liberal and handsome terms in which the official communication, which accompanied the intimation of it to the immediate superintendents of the college, is expressed, and especially by the deep interest in the enlargement and prosperity of the institution which the document evinces on the part of the Hon. the Governor .- Observer, Aug. 14.

MARRIAGE.

July 27. Mr. J. H. Moore, to Miss C. E. Stecher.

Mauritius.

The following picture of this island, drawn by a missionary, appears in the Missionary Register for January last: "We found the people miserably destitute of instruction, which accounts for the general outcry raised by most of the Europeans against the natives for idleness, unfaithfulness, and almost every thing that is evil. The population, according to the information which we received, is about 95,000: to this number of inhabitants the united church affords two chaplains; one of whom preaches to the creoles, or natives born in the island. once a month, at one of the outposts. The circumference of the island is about 160 miles, and the natives are scattered all over its surface, with no other means of instruction in the out-stations than what I have just mentioned; I ought to except the labours of Mr. Le Brun, who, so far as his engagements in Port Louis will allow, preaches to the natives in different parts of the island: I can scarcely at the head of our columns, in order by consider the labours of the Roman Catholic priests an exception; for, if we may judge from the general conduct of the Catholics in Port Louis, the people had almost better be without instruction, than have such as they receive from their priests. With regard to the observance of the Sabbath. I have not the least hesitation in saying, that more work is done on that day by the slaves, government slaves not excepted, than on any other day in the week! The reason probably is this: they are paid according to the quantity of work which they do on that day, but for the labour of the other days of the week they are not paid. It is really heart-rending to the Christian to behold the sacred day of the Lord so grossly unhallowed, even by a people called Christian!"

NAVIGATION LAWS.

It appears by letters from the Isle of France, that the government is actively and rigidly enforcing the provisions of the last navigation acts. Every vessel that has not a regular British register is seized, and a cotemporary paper adds, that a Company's pass and license is no protection. He deems it useful to state this, as some vessels may be sailing under that authority out of this port. The Sydney papers mention that the brig Governor Philtips, formerly of that port, had narrowly escaped seizure; and they add that a Calcutta vessel had also been compelled to make a hasty exit from the Mauritius, and sold to the King of Madagascar. - Mad. Cour. Aug. 14.

BIRTH.

Sept. 3. The wife of Mr. Assist. Com. Gen. Spurrier, of a daughter.

Petherlands India.

THE INSURRECTION.

Hague, Feb. 19 .- By accounts from Batavia of the 23d October last, received here, it appeared that the priest, Kiay Modjo, the envoy of Dipo Negoro, had no pre-vious intention of making a satisfactory arrangement, and that in consequence the armistice has been terminated by com-mand of the commissioner-general. The military operations were vigorously continued with the considerable reinforcements lately arrived from Europe, but had not led to any remarkable result. Subsequent negociations with another envoy from Dipo Negoro have also proved fruitless, but there was a report that that chief of the rebels had been wounded in a skirmish. The Commissioner-general had ordered that some priests should be placed their influence to tranquillize the Javanese population.

NEW PRODUCTIONS.

The operations of the war on Java seem to interfere scarcely at all with the general tranquillity of the island, or the measures of the administration, and considerable attention is paid to the improvement of its internal resources. Amongst other arrangements is the establishment of a board of agriculture, having under it sub-committees at all the principal stations. From a report of the central board to the government, it appears that their attention is directed to the introduction of new plants, as well as the improvement of the old; and whilst rice, cotton, coffee, indigo, and pepper are not neglected, the poppy and the tea-plant have been cultivated with considerable success, and the grape, the cultivation of which was formerly discouraged, that it might not interfere with the product of the Cape vines, has been restored. The mulberry has also been planted, and some successful experiments are said to have established the facility of breeding silk-worms, and manufacturing silk to any extent. The quality of the opium hitherto collected is matter of dispute. According to one report it is little likely to be of any use, either as an intoxicating or narcotic drug. It was given, it is said, to a dog to the extent of sixty grains, without producing any sensible effect, and half that quantity mixed up with tobacco was smoked in cigars by different people, without their experiencing any inconvenience. A second report varies from this, and of three parcels examined, one is pronounced to be of a quality little inferior to the opium imported from Bengal, Thirty grains imported from Bengal, Thirty grains yielded one grain and a half of a pure morphia, whilst a similar quantity of Bengal opium yielded rather more than two grains. The narcotine is the same in both, but the meconic acid is rather more in the Bengal opium. The two other specimens, it is admitted, were of an inferior description, containing too little morphia to be calculated to be of any use in medicine .- Cal. Gov. Gaz., July 19.

FIRE.

On the 10th September a great fire broke out at Buitenzorg, at the place called the Passer, behind the Chinese temple, which consumed ninety houses. The loss caused by this fatal event cannot be estimated; but the whole quarter would necessarily have fallen a prey to the flames, but for the exertions of the magistrates and garrison. Bat: Jour.

China.

THE SEAT OF WAR.

The Chinese Chronicle of Malacca contains a copious article on the geography of the scat of war in Tartary, from Chinese and other authorities, whence we extract the following abridgment.

The seat of the war is that region known to Europeans and called in our maps by the name, of Little Bucharia. On the north of this region is a long chain of mountains, called by various names, such as the Alak mountains, the Mogulistan or Musart mountains; and by the Chinese Teen-shan, i. e. "Heaven's about Tescue-shan great height; also Ta-scue-shan great snowy mountains;" and in poetry Kwan-lun-shan. The Chinese place these mountains in from 40° to 43° N. lat.

To the westward of these, lying nearly at right angles, in long, 43° west of Peking, are the Tsung-shan, "Onion Mountains," so called from abounding in plants of the allum species. This chain is otherwise called Belur Tag or Belur Mountains, and is supposed to be the ancient Imaus. The country on the cast is the Scythia extra Imaum, or the "Scrica" of Ptoleny. The people are the ancient Seres.

To the north of the Tuen-shan is the lake called by D'Anville Palcati nor: in Thomson (where many of the Asiatic names are mis-spelled) Talcati Lake. The Chinese call it the sea of Pa-urh-kih-shih. Klaproth calls it Balchana and Balkhach. Into this sea or lake runs the river Ili or Ele. On this river D'Anville places "Harcas, principal sejour des Hans des Eluts ou Kalmouks." This Harkas is nearly the site of the modern Ele or Ili, the place of transportation for Chinese convicts, called in Canton the Colo, "cold country," whither hankrupt hong merchants and others are transported.

The Teen-shan, or Alak mountains, are spoken of by the Chinese geographers in terms of the highest astonishment for their height, and their icy, luminous glory; some of them being covered with eternal snows; piercing the clouds; reaching to heaven; presenting an appearance of long chains, or spiral peaks with cragged reaks, deep gulphs, vallies, and ravines, which prove these mountains to be the 'dragon-ancestor' of all other mountains in the world.

From the Kia-yu-koan of D'Anville, he ground begins to rise till you get to Hami, or Chami (Chinese Hea-Meih), at he foot of the mountains. Here the road livides, one branch leading to the north of he Alak mountains, and the other to the outh, where are situated the eight great Mohammedan cities, Harashar; Koochay, w Outchi; Acsou, or Aksa; Yarcand, or Yarhand, or Yerghien; Yingkeihshaurh, or Yinkeshar, Cashgar, or Hasicar; Hotten or Kotan; and Wooshih.

From the Imaus or Teungling mountains, where the river Indus rises, the river Yerghien, (Chinese Yeurhkeang) begins to flow, and runs east about 15 degrees, through this long steppe, into the lake called Lopu (or in Chinese Lopov) lake.

The mountains to the north and east of the Hwuy keang, Mahommedan regions, contain gold, silver, and precious stones; and the land in many places is exceeding ly fertile.

This country became the portion of Jagatay, or Zagathai, the son of Genghis Khan. It was governed by a succession of the descendants of Timur till the year 1683, when it was subdued by the Eluths or Kalmucks. To them it remained subject till at a recent period it was conquered by the Tartar-Chinese. In 1759 Keenlung completely vanquished these people; and thus annexed an extensive territory to his dominions.

Agreeably to this statement, the Peking Gazette remarks that these Mahommedan regions had become an integral part of the empire upwards of sixty years; being, according to the preceding paragraph, just sixty-cirlt years.

The Eluths (or Kalmuks) who occupied the Scythia extra Imaum 144 years ago, and were dispossessed only sixty years since, were, in the commencement of the present Tartar-Chinese dynasty, a constant source of annovance. The Emperor Kang-hi went in person against them, in 1696, accompanied by two Europeans, Pere Pereira and Pere Gerbillon. Yungching, the emperor who succeeded Kanghi, complains bitterly against Chin-kourh the ancestor of the present rebel-Chin ko-urh was a Man-chow, of the red standard, related to the imperial family on the throne of China. For some crime he was sent, or absconded, to Ele, which was the region of his ancestors. He carried on a war against the Chinese. At his death he left two sons, Poolootun and Hotseichen. They perished in endeavouring to obtain their independence. But Poolootun left a son, who was the father of the present rebel, Chang-kih-urh. Chang-kihurh's son was murdered by the imperial party, at the commencement of the present affair; but he himself still survives, and has won the hearts of all the Mahommedans who occupy the region of the ancient Seres.

The Chinese geographers say, that although beyond Yarkand, across the Imaus mountains (called by them also Ping-shan, "icy mountains") the road is very craggy and difficult; still there is between Ye-urhkeang and Wan-too-sze-tan (Yarchand and Hindoostan) a "going and coming highway," or great road, "and in this neighbourhood there are a great many gent-producing mountains."

After the conquest of the Eluths by the Emperor Keen-lung, the seat of government was fixed at Ele. The governor of the new territories united the military and the civil power in his own person, under the name of Tseang-keun, "leader of the army." At Cashgar was a resident, with the power of writing direct to the At each of the other towns emperor. were military and civil officers of various ranks. But these offices were often filled by persons sent thither as a sort of exile for crimes committed in China; and convicts were received into the public offices as writers, secretaries, &c. These unprincipled people maltreated (it is said by the Chinese) the native inhabitants, and provoked the present revolt. Chang-kihurh has availed himself of this state of things, and has formed some alliances with the neighbouring tribes.

In the summer of 1826 the rebellion broke out. The resident at Cashgar, who had been governor and commander-in-chief at Ele, attempted some spirited and decisive acts, but was worsted. The troops he directed to proceed to strengthen the garrison at Cashgar were annihilated on their way. He was shut up and closely besieged with about 1,500 men nearly two months, when the city was entered by a secret mine, and the garrison put to the sword. His Majesty, who wept over the despatch, says the commandant killed himself, and fell with the city. The imperial gazettes have reported some advantages over the rebels at Acksa, but they are supposed, by the Chinese, to be greatly magnified to please the emperor. from the river Amour; from the Kirin Oula of D'Anville, in eastern Tartary; from the imperial body-guard at Peking, and other places, have, to the number of 30,000, proceeded by the N.W. frontier, to Hami, where they were arrested in their progress by the inclemency of the winter.

Former Chinese armies against the Huns have perished in those regions, as the French did at Moscow, The general Huns have perisined the French did at Moscow, The general Yang-yu-chun has complained, and his The treasury department has issued six millions of taels, and have established what is considered an efficient commissariat, to provide, on the one hand, regular supplies for the troops, and on the other to avoid any useless waste. They are directed to furnish accurate plans and drawings of the progress of the army, the roads they take, their principal halting places, and every collateral circumstance, for the information of the emperor.

Some of the Chinese think, that whichever way the present contest terminates, it will be the work of several years. Its effects on commerce are already felt very unfavourably; chiefly on account of the northern provinces of China Proper being in a great state of excitement and annovance, occasioned by the progress of the military through them.

Pekin gazettes to the 22d February contain accounts from Ele. Chang-ling, the generalissimo, reports, that by the efforts of some emissaries he sent, who spread the report that the grand army was gather. ing like clouds that would soon break in a terrible storm on the heads of the rebels. the Mahommedans of Khoten had delivered up, bound, form of their leaders to the Chinese, and had put a hundred of their followers to death.

When the seal of the murdered Chinese resident at Khoten (who was killed at the breaking out of the insurrection) was delivered to Chang-ling, with the four rebel leaders, he raised an altar and table dedicated to the great officers who had died in battle during the present war, and putting these men to a slow and ignominious death, offered them as a sacrifice to the faithful souls of the departed heroes.

By the perusal of this statement, his Imperial Majesty says, he obtains a little vent to his ire and indignation, since the mere report of the collecting together of the army of extermination has induced the Mahommedaus to bind their leaders, and redeem themselves. He expects that when once the "lances of Heaven" are pointed westward, the termination will be as casy as " splitting a reed."

Rewards of money, medals, feathers, honours, and silk, were liberally conferred on all those who effected the subjugation of these rebel chiefs.

A RECENT PROCLAMATION PROHIBITING FE-MALES FROM BEING SPECTATORS AT II-LUMINATIONS AND PROCESSIONS.

Mr. Woo, military and civil superintendent of the districts Hwuy, Chaou, and Hea, in the province of Canton, for the purpose of prohibiting and abolishing low and vicious customs and restoring good manners, has caused every street to be inspected. It has been discovered that on the 15th of the first moon of every year, the soldiers and people incur great expense by contending who will make the most splendid illuminations, which they continue for six or seven successive nights. At the same time, both the soldiers and people permit their wives and daughters to mix with the men as spectators of such things. This is their constant practice every year. Now it is a fixed custom through the whole empire (verbally under the whole heavens) to light candles and make illuminations on the 15th of the first moon, but it is only in the district of Chaou where people allow their wives and daughters to wander out and look at them. Females ought to dwell in deep retirement, in-doors, governing themselves, and ought not on slight occasions to appear out of doors, even in fair day. How should they, for the sake of viewing illuminations and coveting pleasure, lead each other out at night, placing themselves in the midst of crowds of men!

That which a woman should value is her person or character. If she degrade her person, she becomes vile in the extreme. How can she again have any face to stand by the side of her father or husband?

It is not merely much things as secret agreements to meet among the mulberry trees, scaling the walls of the secret apartments, or sending letters on the streams of the Ke (a river) that are deemed degrading the person. But whatever excites any pleasurable feelings, or astonishes the mind, degrades the person. How much more elbowing and treading on the heels of men under the light of candles, or of the moon ! Will not young men in such cases touch and pinch the ladies? and will not both sexes by their looks move each other's passions and steal each other's wishes? Will not these rambling females wait for the gentlemen at the corners of the town?

What is still worse, in Hae Yang, at the processions which take place at all the temples of Fuh, when the literati wrangle for pre-eminence, the females, in the first place, run after the priests, and, in the second place, they mingle promiscuously with the literati. In such scenes, the disgraceful irregularities that take place no words can express. Besides, there are few females who can restrain and regulate themselves properly, but many there are whose passions are easily moved. Even when they are kept close in the secret apartments, instances take place of their clumbing over the walls to meet with the gentlemen, and of their being so moved by the sound of the harp, as to give rise to the intention of eloping: how much more will they form secret plans when they attend the illuminations and processions! Still it is their fathers and husbands who are most culpable. That low ignorant men should permit their wives and daughters to do such things is not to be wondered at; but why should scholars and men who understand right principles follow the stream, and be carried along on the waves? Alas! that our manners should have come to this pitch. It is truly lamentable; unless we impose rigorous prohibitions, they will daily wax worse, so that the people of the Chaou district will become nearly as bad as foreigners. For this cause we issue the present proclamation to inform all, that from this time they ought to be awakened to a sense of their former misconduct. All ought to exhort and stimulate each other to reform. Fathers should exhort their daughters, and husbands command their wives. If there still be any void of shame, and who dare not give rigorous warning, nor strongly restrain from such irregular conduct, they will, upon correction, be punished according as the law directs. No pardon will be granted. Let all tremble and obey. Do not act contrary to this proclamation.

CANTON.

Arrival of H. C. ships from England.

Aug. 3. Alfred and Kellie Custle, —7. Brosbournsbury.—8. Bridgetouter, —94. Herefordshre.—25. Repube.—35. Lowether Custle.—31. Barosan.—Sept. 1. Lord Hungerford.—4. Duke of York.—5. Hythe. —14. Bonboy and Buckinghunshire.—18. Charles Grant.—19. Waterlon.—24. Duke of Sussex.—27. Ceneral Kyd and Attian.—Oct. 14. Windsor.

The Persian Gulf.

By private letters received from Muscat. we learn that the Imaum was fitting out an expedition against Mombas and other ports on the east coast of Africa. It is to consist of the ships Liverpool, Caroline, Prince of Wales, Mustapha, Nascer Shaw, and the Vestal and Nasaree brigs, and will sail in the end of October, under the personal command of the Imaum. Mombas is a considerable seaport in Zanguebar, and the inhabitants had long thrown off all allegiance, never at any time very strong, they owed to the Imaums of Muscat. Aware that the Imaum's navy had latterly been increasing, and dreading that he might soon employ it against them, the chiefs of Mombas anxiously courted the favour and protection of Capt. Owen, while there with his surveying ships. That officer was persuaded to plant the British standard on the walls of Mombas, and appointed one of his lieutenants resident. When these arrangements were known here and in England, they were disapproved of, as they interfered with the claims of the Imaum; and thus a most eligible settlement on that coast, equally desirable in a commercial point of view, and as being an excellent station for the prevention of the slave trade, was forced to be abandoned.

A report had reached Muscat that a French vessel (probably from Bourbon or the Mauritius) had been cut off at some place on the Zanguebar coast; the master and all but two men murdered. She was suspected to have been on a slaving voyage.

At Bussorah the Turks and the Chauh tribe of Arabs are at open warfare. The Sheik of Grane has joined the former with a fleet of bugalows, which gives them a decided advantage over the Chaubs.

Capt.

Capt. Bethem, of the H. C.'s cruizer Cline, had a fraces in the end of August with the Shelt of Bushire, which erose out of the desertion of some of the Amherst's crew into the Sheik's service. Cant. Betham, it appears, sent a messenger to the Sheik, politely requesting him to order the deserters to be delivered up. The chief beat the messenger most unmercifully, then sent to seize the boat's crew who brought him on shore, and threw them into a dungeon. The prompt and decisive measures taken by Capt. Betham soon brought the Sheik to his senses; but not before several boats' crews from the cruizers had been landed on the beach to attack him. Thus was the British flag gloriously supported, and the effusion of blood spared .- Bom. Gaz., Oct. 10.

Turkey.

DESTRUCTION OF BIBLES AND OFFEESSION OF CONVERTS.

The Missionary Register contains the following statement, compiled from the representations of various missionaries in the Turkish dominions, regarding the existing persecution to which Protestants are exclusively exposed in that country, which is attributed to the artifices of the Roman Catholics:—

" There is a subject which intimately concerns the kingdom of Christ in this land, on which we have for some time been wishing to disclose our sentiments. The subject to which we allude is that of Turkish intolerance in matters of religion. We do not mean that intolerance which is exercised toward Mahomedans themselves, nor do we mean any intolerance established by law against any other of the religious denominations of the empire; but we refer to that intolerance which actually exists, or which, in the present state of things, may be easily made to exist, whether by the negligence or connivance, or whether by the positive agency of the government.

"Of late, a number of individuals, natives of this country, have, apparently from the sober convictions of reason and conscience, felt themselves bound to differ from the sect of religion in which they were brought up; and nearly all these have suffered, on this account, persecution more or less severe, and this too with the knowledge and permission, if not the express command, of the constituted civil authorities.

"The firman of the sultan against the Holy Scriptures, issued in 1824, has opened to superstition and bigotry a wide door for their intolerance, in regard to one of the most precious and indisputable rights of Christians, This unprecedented order has, in the hands of avil mess, been nade the ples for besiding up several flourishing Christian schools, burning hundreds of the book of God, and imprisoning and otherwise punishing those with whom this book has been found. Owing to this order it has doubtless been, in part, that scarcely an individual Christian has, in the year past, called at any of the depots in Syria to purchase the Holy Scriptures.

"With respect touthe persecuted individuals, who have experienced a change of religious views, it is to be observed. that, in regard to the government, they stand in the same relation and possess the same character as before: they were viewed as infidels before, and they are viewed as infidels still. Not only, therefore, does the voice of reason say, that those persons ought to receive from government the same protection as before, but we find that their own books and judicial decisions declare, that all infidels are to be considered as a common class, and are therefore to be treated in the same manner, and that they forfeit none of their rights by passing over from one sect of infidelity to another. If any distinction could be admitted, there are good reasons why those who adopt evangelical views should be most favoured; since the religion of the Gospel is certainly free from many solid objections, which Moslems urge against Judaism and Popery.

" With regard to the Holy Scriptures, we believe that these books have always been allowed to native Christians, from the time of Mahomet to the year 1824; and that they have been, indifferently, printed in the country or imported from the Christians of Europe in any numbers, without any impediment or inquiry on the part of government. We are also told, that, in the Mahomedan conquests, peculiar privileges were to be granted to all those whose religion was found to be contained in books; as if these books were to be considered a benefit to these people, and not an injury. What, then, has excited the Ottoman government, at this late day, to venture on a step so new and unjust, as not only to cut off at a blow from their Christian subjects almost the only source from which their holy books have always been derived, but even to give public orders that all such of these books as have been lately introduced from Europe shall be forcibly taken from the hands of their possessors and burnt? The only reasons for this step which can be gathered from the firman itself, are-1. That these are "false books." 2. That they have come from Europe. 3. That they have been printed in considerable numbers. And is it then a new thing that these books, in the view of Moslems, are false books? Is it a new thing, that they come from Europe? Ot, is it a new thing that they are printed in editions of "two or three thousand of each sort?" These are evidently not the real causes of the order in question, for these have been in operation for centuries, and have been found by experiment to be inadequate to produce such an effect.

" It seems obvious from the case itself, that this extraordinary firman owes its birth to the machinations of those who dread the influence of the Christianity of the Bible, in destroying the power of that corrupt form of Christianity which has been freely tolerated for ages, and it becomes, therefore, a question in which Protestant nations, as such, are deeply interested. It is added, on this subject, in reference to our own country-The treaty between Great Britain and the Porte professes to place England on the footing of the most-favoured nation. Where is this impartiality, so solemnly pledged to the British nation? Other nations are allowed to send hither hundreds of missionaries, and whole editions of really "false books," and to erect here convent after convent, and to receive native Christians under their religious instruction: for hundreds of years have other nations gone on with this work of theirs, with little or no complaint from government; but now, the moment such liberty is taken by the English nation, and in the most inoffensive and unobjectionable form, that of distributing among Christians their own sacred books, immediately a public order is issued to prevent this work! We see not why this is not really and properly a violation of treaty; as truly so, as it would to be burn all the Romish books, or shut up all the convents of the Terra-Santa establishment, or expel all the Latin missionaries from the country.

"If proper representations are made on this subject in the right quarter, we have strong hopes that the result would be a formal repeal of the present obnoxious firman—express permission to English missionaries to reside in the country, in their own proper character—leave to distribute Bibles and erect churches like other nations—and a full security against violence to the persons and property of those who might choose to assemble and unite with them in their worship."

NEW SOUTH WALES.

LAW.

A case of importance to ship-owners and mariners was decided in the Vice-Admiralty Court of this colony, July 25, in Auat. Journ. Vol. 25. No. 147.

a suit of two seamen for wages. The circumstances are these. The two seamen, named Simms and Foster, signed ship's articles in London, stipulating with the master of the Cumberland to proceed to this colony and return to the port of London, and that, according to the established law on this point, they were not to claim their wages for the voyage until the ship arrived in England. On reaching Sydney the seamen quitted the ship without the leave of the master, and entered on board the man-of-war the Rainbow, then stationed here. They claimed their wages which were earned by the outward voyage, but which were payable only according to indenture when the ship reached England. The master resisted their claim as far as payment in this colony, but was willing to draw upon his correspondents in London, so that the seamen would still receive their earnings according to the original agreement. By the 2 Geo. II. c. 36, deserting a merchant after signing ship's articles, is attended with forfeiture of whatever wages may be due to the deserter: but for the sake of the English navy, it is provided by the same Act, that the clause which creates a forfeiture "shall not debar any seaman from entering into his Majes. ty's service, nor shall he for such entry forfeit the wages due to him during his service in such merchant ship, nor shall such entry be deemed a desertion." Had the suitors in this case left the Cumberland without entering on board a King's ship, they would have forfeited their wages; but it was not a question of forfeiture, but whether the entry on board the Rainbow accelerated the payment, and put those men who had stipulated to receive their wages when the entire voyage out and home was performed, in a condition to demand payment here. All the facts were admitted on behalf of plaintiff and defendant, and the judge of the Vice Admiralty Court, on hearing the argument on both sides, determined the point of law in favour of the seamen, and ordered their wages to be paid them, calculating such wages to the time of the ship's delivery of the outward cargo.

Crime seems to multiply in this colony, as might indeed be expected. One paper says, that scarcely a week passes without an execution. Robberies and forgeries are the offences.

The tread-mill seems to have worked wonders amongst the disorderly and dissolute. The numbers sentenced to this punishment have gradually become too few to put it in motion, and "running round a ring in double quick time" has been substituted for the discipline of the few.

The number of deaths which have occurred within these last few weeks are 3 G unpre-

In former unprecedented in the colony. In former times it was rare to hear of a death, but now the bell is continually tolling. During the last week there has been upwards of ten deaths and funerals in Hobart Town. The prevailing disease, the catarrh, seems still to continue all over the country, affecting persons in various ways. Some have experienced two or three severe attacks; and among the number are some who were never affected with any illness in the colony since its formation.

By the last arrival from Port Macquarie, says the Australian, we learn that the agricultural establishment there bears a very promising aspect. twenty acres of wheat are looking remarkably healthy, and promise next harvest to afford a luxuriant crop for the sickle.

BIRTHS.

July 4. At Sydney, Mrs. de Mestre, of a daughter. 8. At Woodlands, Bathurst, the lady of John Street, Esq., of a son.

MARRIAGES.

July 31. At Sydney, Mr. James, master of his Majesty's colonial schooner Isabella, to Miss E. Hick, of Portsmouth.

Aug. 3. At Castle Forbes, John Larnack, Esn, Ano of W. Larnack, Esq., of Newton of Auchengale, county of Cathness, Na., to Entily, eldest daughter of James Mudle, Esq., of Castle Forbes, Hunter's River.

14. At Sydney, the Rev. J. Hobbs, Wesleyan missionary to New Zealand, to Miss Broggref, late of Ramsgate, county of Kent.

DFATHS.

June 26. At Parramatta, Letitla, wife of Mr. James Wright, of that town, aged 63.
July 19. At Sackville Reach, near Windsor, Frances, wife of Mr. C. M. Doyle, in her 27th

Year.
Aug. 10. At Sydney, Mrs. Nobbes, of Upper Pitt Street. She arrived in the colony in 1793.
Lately. At Sydney, the lady of John Wood, Esq., of Chipping.
— On the banks of the Hawkesbury, of influen-— On the banks of the lawksoliny, of indenta-za, the following respectable emigrant colonists: —Mrs. Hall, aged 68; Mrs. Davison, aged 66: and Mr. Mein, aged 66. They all arrived in the colony in the same ship, viz. the Coromandel. — Dr. Townson, a very old colonist.

VAN DIEMEN'S LAND.

BIRTHS.

May 7. At Hobart Town, the lady of G. Cart-wright, Esq., solicitor, of a son. 23. At Rothbury, Lennox, the lady of J. C. Sutherland, Esq., J. P., of a son. 25. At Launceston, the lady of the Rev. R. Claiborne, of a son and helr.

MARRIAGE.

May 5. At Hobart Town, Mr. W. Wise, drug-gist, to Margaret, daughter of the late Capt. Holdship, commissariat department, Dublin.

DEATHS.

March 20. Mrs. Lawler, wife of Mr. M. Lawler, settler, of Muddy Plains.

April 15. At Launceston, Mr. N. Gribble, of that place, builder and surveyor.

— At Hobart Town, Mr. Corney, eldest son of R. Corney.

— At Hobart Town, Mr. Corney, eddest son or R. Corney, Esq. May 17. At Hobart Town, Mrs. Davey, relict of Colonel Davey, formerly Lieut. Governor of Van Diemen's Land.

27. At Launceston, of catenth, Mrs. Dore, mid-wife, of that place.

Mrs. Hays, wife of Mr.
Hays, the deputy shelff.

June 2. On the Macquarie River, Elizabeth, wife of Mr. H. Robertson.

4. At Hobart Town, the lady of Maj. Loane, aged 48;—also, in child-birth, Mrs. Bowden, wife of Mr. Jos. Bowden, of the Lamb Inn, Brisbane Street.

Street.

Street.

12. At Hobart Town, Mr. Jas. Mitchell, aged 73.

He arrived in the colony in 1788.

22. At Hobart Town. Mrs. Green, wife of Mr.

M. Green, of Liverpool Street.

Lately. Mrs. Morrisey, wife of Mr. Morrisey, of the Crown Inn, Bagdad.

Cave of Good Hove.

APPOINTMENTS.

May 31. The Rev. J. S. S. Ballot to be minister of church of George.

July 3. Mr. C. F. Ecklon permitted to practice as an apothecary in the colony.

11. Mr. J. F. Goodwin to be notary public in residency of Simon's Town, in room of Mr. C. M. Lind, removed to Cape Town.

Mr. T. B. Woolls to be assistant registrar and guardian of slaves in residency of Simon's Town, v. Mr. C. M. Lind resigned.

18. G. E. Overbeek, Esq., to be vice-president of Orphan Chamber, v. A. V. Bergh, Esq., deceased.

Sept. 24. Mr. L. Witham (having returned to colony) permitted to resume his practice as a notary public in Cape Town.

THE IRRUPTION OF THE NATIVES.

By advices received at the Colonial Office from the frontier, it appears probable that the Fetcani had returned to the country from whence they came, beyond the Orange River, as no further account had been received of them from any of the tribes bordering on the colony.

The Lieut. Governor arrived at Fort Beaufort on the 6th Sept., and the next day was met by Gaika and other Caffre chiefs, who renewed their assurances of attachment to the British government, and expressed their resolution to defend their country to the utmost, if attacked by the Fetcani or other tribes .- Cape Gov. Caz., Sept. 21.

SUPREME COURT.

We understand that a meeting of the legal practitioners in Cape Town was held on Tuesday at the chambers of his Honour Sir John Wylde, when the regulations of the charter were communicated to them, under which they will be permitted to practice in the new Supreme Court. His honour was likewise understood to state, on behalf of himself and brother judges, that the court will take up the present practice and proceedings at the precise stage at which they shall be found on the 1st of January next. The present court of justice and court of appeals are abolished by the charter. Appeals will lie from the Supreme Court to the King in Council, but only in eases where the matter in dispute shall exceed £1,000. We are given to understand that the charter will be promulgated in a very short time.

The president of the court of justice, Sir John Truter, it is said, retires on a pension of £800 per annum; each of the other members is to receive £200, with the exception of Mr. Rogerson, who is nominated town collector,-Cape Colonist, Nov. 22.

THE LORD BISHOP OF CALCUTTA.

Before his departure from this colony (on the 26th October), the Right Rev. the Lord Bishop of Calcutta confirmed, in the Dutch reformed church, 360 persons. His Lordship also consecrated, for an English church, the portion of ground in the Government Gardens opposite Berg Street, granted by his Honour the Lieutenant-Governor for that purpose .- Ibid.

DANGEROUS SHOAL SAID TO LIE OFF ALGOA BAY.

To the Editor of the Asiatic Journal.

Sir :- Capt. Riy, of the Cragiever, states that he saw breakers on a dangerous shoal, which bears S. 48° E, by compass, from Lady Donkin's Monument, at Fort Elizabeth, distant five or six leagues, and lies five or six miles to the south-eastward of Cape Recife; and he says it is well known to the coasters and fishermen about Algoa Bay. If the above-mentioned danger exists in the situation assigned to it by Capt. Riy, there can be little doubt of the Company's ship William Pitt having perished on it, with all her crew, on the night of the 18th December 1813; but it is surprising that a dangerous shoal can possibly exist in this situation, without being frequently seen by ships passing Cape Recife.

JAS. HORBURGH.

Chart Office, East-India House, Feb. 17, 1828.

BIRTHS.

June 4. At Worcester. the lady of C. Trappes, Esq., landdrost of the district, of a son. 17. At Gradf-Reinet, the lady of E. Bergh, Esq., of a still-born child.

Christenings from May to November 1827.

A son of J. A. Smuts, Esq., baptized Johannes Adrian.

Adrian,
Two sons of Capt. H. J. Ormond, H.M.'s 49th text, baptized John and George,
A daughter of Fred. Ducklit, Esq., baptized
Mary Catherine.
A son of J. P. Bolleau, Esq., major Hon. E. I.
Company's service, baptized John Peter.
A daughter of Wm. Cunningham, Esq., captain
Hon. E. I. Company's service, baptized Jane
Smith.

A daughter of P. L. Cloete, Esq., baptized Ca-tharine Maria.

A daughter of P. Auret, Esq., baptized Frederica. A son of Jos. Hodgson, Esq., baptized Francis

A 500 Of see arongson.

Drew. A daughter of H. B. Welnaud, Esq., baptized Catharine Elizabeth.

A 500 of Lleut, L. W. N. Van der Riet, baptized William Christian Carl.

William Christian Carl.

Maria.
A son of Lieut. F. Fielding, H.M.'s 96th regt., baptized Edward.
A son of Lieut. G. M. Pedder, R.N., commandant of Robben Island, baptized Martinus William.
A son of W. A. Wentzel, Esq., baptized William Adrian.

A son of Lieut. J. T. Lamb, R. N., baptised William Ruchanan.

MARRIAGES.

June 8. At Graham's Town, Lieut. T. S. Knight, Cape Corps, to Anna, eldest daughter of the late Capt. M. J. Sparks.
July 16. Mr. J. Calmeross, to Miss M. A. Cart-

July 16. Mr. J. Carnerose, to Miss Mr. A. Cartwright.
24. At Government House, D. Montague, fourth son of the late Right Hon. Spencer Perceval, to Mary Jane, eldest daughter of Maj.Gen.R. Bourke, Mary Jane, eldest faughter of Maj.Gen.R.Bourke, Lleut. Governor, &c.

*Aug. 5. At Somerset, Jas. O'Reilly, Esq., to Miss J. W. Hendriks.

20. Mr. W. M. Barber, to Miss M. Dixon.

*Sept. 1. Wim. Shaw, Esq., captain Hon. E. I.

Company's service, to Miss L. M. Parry.

5. The Rev. B. C. Goodison, A.M., chaplain to the forces, to Eleanor Maria, daughter of Jas.

Horne, Esq., dep. assist. com. gen.

Oct. 11. Lieut. M. Williams, H.M.'s royal engi ners, to Miss C. Judge.

Dec. 12. Chas. Griffiths, Esq., to Cornelia Wil helmina, widow of the late Jas. Fichat, Esq.

— Mr. W. L. Holmes to Miss E. H, Harrison,

DEATHS.

May 27. Lydla Johanna Smith, wife of Mr. H.

May 27. Lytia Johanna Sharet.
Steward, aged 40.
June 13. Thomas Mercer, Esq., aged 35.
— Mr. T. D. Palmer, aged 42.
14. Drowned, whilst landing from the Orange Grove, off Port Frances, Mr. Murphy, Mrs. Garrat and her two children, together with two boat-

18. J. A. Kirsten, Esq., aged 64.
July 5. Mr. M. Matthleson, aged 51.
8. A. V. Bergh, Esq., aged 62.
— Leonora Loret, widow of the late J. G. Van Helsdingin, Esq., aged 73.
19. Mr. W. Harris, aged 30.
Aug. 9. Mr., Geertruylus Fleck, widow of the late D. P. Haupt, Esq., aged 64.
13. Mr. Joseph Ranken, aged 47.
— At Port Elizabeth, Mr. Wm. Reed, sen., aged 62.
23. Mr. Michael Wolff, aged 58.
Sept. 4. Mr. Thos, Thomson, aged 41.
14. Marla, daughter of Mr. C. Cruywagen, aged seven years.

14. Maria, Gaugner of Mr. C. Criywagen, agea seven years. 15. Wm. F. Versfeldt, Esq., aged 47. Oct. 4. Mr. J. H. Gnade, aged 56. 30. Elizabeth Heady, youngest daughter of De-puty Assist. Com. Gen. G. Veoland, aged 4 years. Dec. 7. Mr. G. F. Lehman, aged 24. — Mrs. J. F. Wernsdorff, aged 41. 12. At Eerste River, P. Diemal, Esq., aged about 67.

St. Melena.

Nov. 13. The lady of Dr. James Arnott, super-intending surgeon, of a son.

INDIAN SECURITIES AND EXCHANGES.

Calcutta, Sept. 27, 1827. Government Securities.

Madras, Oct. 10, 1827.

......283 Prem.

.. 261 Prem.

At the Rate prevailing among Merchants and Brokers in buying and selling Pub-lic Securities, viz. 100} Madras Hs. per In Disc.

> Bombay, Oct. 13, 1827. A Five per cent. Loan open.

Exchange.
On London, at 6 months' sight, las 84d, per Rupce.
On Calcutta, at 30 days' sight, los Bonn. Rs. per 100 Sicca Rupces.
On Madras, at 30 days' sight, 99 Bonn. Rs. per 109
Matras Natras Natras Natras Natras Natras

Singapore, Sept. 1, 1827. Exchange.

Gov. Bills on Bengal, at 30 days' sight, per bio Sp. Ds., 207 Sic. Rs. Private Bills on ditto-Private Bills on London, per Sp. Ds. 4s. 2d.

Postscript.

February 28.

Larrais from Rangoon state that every thing is tranquil in that quarter. Great exertions were making to collect treasure for the payment of the balance of the crore of rupees, and it would commence on the 5th of September, the day appointed, it was supposed. It was generally believed, however, that the Burmahs would be unable to collect the whole amount within the limited period. Should our government insist on punctual payment, it is said they would be obliged to open the public treasury, which would benefit the poor inhabitants, while the lost would in some measure fall on the court party, who were the real aggressors, and are said to be immensely rich, and not as all contributing to the payment. The authorities at Rangoon have already levied contributions on the native merchants.

Recent intelligence from Tavoy and Mergui represent these provinces to be in a very quiet and flourishing condition; but the population is very limited. The revenue of Tavoy is considerable, and it is expected that both provinces will, in the next year, defray their expenses.

HOME INTELLIGENCE.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

House or Commons, February 7.

State of the Law .- Mr. Brougham, in the course of his masterly speech upon the state and administration of the common law, took occasion to touch upon the subject of appeals and other topics connected with the law of India. We subjoin a copious report of this part of his speech.* " I next come, Sir, to speak of the court of Privy Council; a very important court, and of which the members discharge as important functions as any of the judges of this country, because they have to determine not only upon questions and matters connected with the civil law in cases usually appealed to them, but they are also judges in the last resort in all prize cases. The point, however, to which I more immediately address myself on this head is, that they are the judges in all our plantation appeals. They are thus made the supreme judges in the last resort over every one of our colonies, whether they happen to be situated among those immense territories which you possess in the East, where you and the East-India Company together rule over not less than 70,000,000 of subjects; or among those rich and populous islands which stud the seas of the Indian Ocean, and form the great Eastern Archipelago; or among those, again, of the western hemisphere, where the parties are frequently men of very large property, extremely unsettled in their notions of personal rights, and excessively litigious, as all the children of the new world are supposed to be, both from their physical and moral constitution. All this immense jurisdiction over the rights of property and succession, over rights political and legal, and all the questions growing out of such an extended province, are exercised and discussed by the Privy Council, and the Privy Council alone. It is obvious, that from the distance of these colonies, and the immense variety of the matters submitted to them, and the varying principles upon which those matters are determined, a court, constituted as the court of Privy Council is, must be excessively deficient in many of the properties that ought to attach to it. But what adds incredibly to these difficulties and to this defect is, that hardly any two of the colonies can be named, in one of which a different law does not prevail from that which obtains in the other. In some of these colonies the law is the Dutch law, in others the Spanish, in others the French, in others the Danish. In our Eastern possessions these variations are, if possible, yet greater; while one territory is swayed by the Mahomedan law another is ruled by the native or Hindoo law, and this again, in some of our possessions, is qualified or superseded by the Pundit law. All these laws must come, in their turns, in review, before the necessarily ignorant privy councillor. To supply or remedy that ignorance, he ought to have much time, and to employ much research : he ought to have for his guidance, judges extremely distinguished for their knowledge of the practice of the law, and cognizant of the various modes in which, and the various principles upon which, the law is administered in those numerous and distant countries. He ought to have for his information, a bar, limiting its practice to these appeal questions. But, Sir, because all this would be much to do, is little reason for doing nothing at all in the matter. At present, little indeed has been done, and I will show why I say this. To supply all the necessary ignorance I speak of, the Privy Council sits on certain very extraordinary days; the 30th of January, some day in May, Midsummer-day, and so on. I find on an average of twelve years, ending in January 1826, they sat in each year, upon this average, nine days and a little more, to dispose of all these multiplied appeals from all the British subjects in ludia; from our own civil courts, to the jurisdiction of which all these subjects are locally amenable, throughout the wide extent of the several presidencies of Calcutta, Bombay, and Madras; to dispose of all the causes which come up from the three several courts of India, the Sudder Adawlut, the Zillah, or Native Court, and the Circuit Court; the cases travelling from the two first of these, comprizing all the appeals in contested suits between the nalive Hindoos, the half-caste people, and the Mohammedan inhabitants. In the Same manner, notwithstanding that all the appeals from Ccylon, the Mauritius, and elsewhere, and from our colonies in the West-Indies, come before the Privy Council, nine days' sittings are supposed to suffice for the decision of the whole of But nine days do not suffice, nor any thing like suffice, for this purpose, and if I were to read the summary I have in my hands, I could easily demonstrate such to be the fact. It appears that in all these twelve years taken together, the appeals have amounted to but few in number. I marvel that they are so few, and yet I marvel not, because in point of fact, you have no adequate tribunal for their decision, and the absence of such a tribunal is an absolute denial of justice to the native subjects of Great Britain in those colonies. The total number is only 467; but including upwards of fifty, which come from India, and appear not to have been regularly entered, there are 517. Take' them at 517. Of these 517-243 only have been disposed of, but only 129 appeals have been heard; for the others were compromised, or withdrawn, either from the hopelessness of delay, which had intervened between the appeal and the sentence, or not. prosd .- cancelled for want of being prosecuted. Consequently, the Privy Council must have heard ten appeals only per year, or one and one ninth, in the course of one day's sitting. Again, of the 129, which were heard and disposed of, no less than fifty-six of the original sentences were altered, or, generally speak-ing, wholly reversed. Now, fifty six, out of 129, Sir, is a very large proportion, and clearly shows that the limited number of appeals must have arisen, not from the want of cases to appeal, but from the appreliension of finding no adequate appeal court. And that these sentences should appear to have been rather premature, and ill-digested in most instances, can be no matter of astonishment when we find a gallant lieutenant-general lord chancellor in one court, and an active captain president in another; and a staid major officiating as judge-advocate in a third.— (A laugh.)—In many of these cases, Sir, a military lord chancellor has decided in the court below; and the judges, the members of the Privy Council here, verse his decision on appeal; and still it is found necessary to continue this system of colonial judicature, and to sanction, as indeed is now the case in this country, the mixture of civil and military functions in one and the same individual .- (A laugh.) -It is this course which renders appeals frequently necessary. And now, Sir, for the matter of delay—I little wonder to see my learned friend who sits behind me, yawning and uneasy at this part of the subject (we believe the allusion was meant for Sir J. Scarlett), for of a truth it is a most dry and tedious one; but, with submission to him, I must venture to proceed. As in those colonial courts you have no lawyers to preside, but officers who sit as judges, judges, so in the court of privy council you have any but lawyers to decide on the appeals which come before it; for you are not to suppose that the business of these nine days upon which they sit is taken up by lawyers; one or two lawyers there are, but the rest are laymen. Certainly a right hon, gentleman whom I see opposite to me is very often there, and his presence is sure to be attended with great advantage to us. Occasionally one may have the pleasure of finding the judge-advocate there; but the Master of the Rolls alone is always to be seen there, of the lawyers. One meets, too, sometimes with an elderly gentleman, who has formerly been an ambassador, and now and then with a junior lord of the admiralty, who has been neither ambassador nor judge, but would be exceedingly fit to be both, had he happened to have been educated for either .- (Much laughter.)-And such, Sir, is the constitution of that awful Privy Council which sits at Westminster, and this is the court which determines without appeal, and in a manner the most summary which can be conceived in this country: for instance, I once saw a property of £20,000 sterling per annum disposed of in a few minutes by the learned members of this Privy council, by a reversal of a sentence which had been determined on by all the judges in India, after no less than nineteen days' most anxious consideration. This is the court whose decisions are without appeal, and irreversible unless by act of parliament, which I never yet heard of in such a matter-that dispenses the law and disposes of the property of 80,000,000 of people. I cannot pass from this subject without instancing a case singularly in point. The Ram, or Rajah of Ramnad, having died, a question arose between the Ranee, or queen, and other members of her family, with respect to the succession to the vacant musnud, and to the right to the personal property of the deceased sovereign, and the territorial revenue, or peishcush, as it is called, of the dominions of Ramnad. With the single exception of this peishcush, the rest of the revenues of the deceased Ram of Ramnad had devolved upon the Rance; but in respect of this exception, the law of the country, like the Salique law of France, was express upon the point of exclusion. The East-India Company having certain claims upon it, took measures to secure this peishcush, in the manner usually adopted by them in satisfaction of those claims. The situation of the country is scarcely less peculiar than the circumstances in which its affairs thus became involved. It lies in the direct road through which the pilgrims to the several sanctuaries on the southern coasts of India, and especially in the island of Ramisseram, annually proceed with rich offerings; and it is through these territories also that the votaries to the shrine of Juggernaut proceed with their costly tributes. From these pilgrims and devotees very ample tolls and imposts are yearly collected. On the death of her highness the Rance. in 1809, different claimants appeared, to dispute the property which had so devolved on her. Some of those persons came into the zillah courts and put in an appeal, but that appeal was not lodged in the prive council until the year 1814; and what has been the consequence of this delay of justice? Why, that the kingdom of Ramnad has been all this time (for it is observable, I repeat, that the Hon. Company has been taking care of its revenues in the mean time by its usual summary process) in the keeping of sheriffs' officers. (A laugh.)

• From the Mirror of Parliament, a valuable work, which promises to supply a great desideratum, namely, an authentic record of all the speeches in parliament.—Ed.

It is strictly in the custody of sheriffs' officers, having been taken, as I may say, in execution; but taken there by final pro. cess, rather than by mesne process, as it would have been here. The hon, and learned gentleman went on to observe: it would thus appear, that in the course of twelve years here and been a few hundreds of appeals only, when, if proper courts of appeal had been provided for the appellants, there would have been thousands. As long as we would persist in having colonies, we must have appeals from them; and the ignorance of the existing forum for the determination of those colonial appeals, could only be remedied by providing it with a peculiar bar, duly educated for such a practice. He called on parliament for God's sake not to defer the act of justice which he thus pressed it on them to perform, and he expatiated on the perfect incompetency with which a young man, brought up as a writer, must be supposed, on entering upon his official duties in India, to discharge the important trusts, to the due fulfilment of which alone the natives of those regions could look for the protection of their rights and property. Nothing was more clear than that, under any conceivable state of circumstances, such a party must be a mere tool in the hands of his pundit, or of some of the more designing parties, by whom he would of necessity be surrounded. It is well known that the system has been tried with perfect success in Ceylon, under the superintendence of Sir A. Johnston. In his efforts, to be sure, he was lionestly and boldly supported by the government at home, and it stands recorded that the experiment was attended with unequivocal success; and one instance has been particularly adverted to, in which, in a case of murder, out of a jury of twelve, eleven being on one side, and one young Brahmin on the other, the one held out against all the rest, until, by the force of his su-perior judgment, he brought the others round to his view. The tact evinced by this young Brahmin, and his exquisite skill in the examination of witnesses, and his ultimate success with the jury, after the judge and counsel had done all in their power, and, probably from the want of local information, failed, attracted the admiration of the whole court,* Now let us look at the beneficial consequences of adopting such a course. Nothing can tend more to conciliate the natives than to make them a party in the administration of justice. (Hear!) It gives them a knowledge of the benefits of a system of social order founded upon justice; elevates them to a rank and importance in the state, which gives them a direct interest in the maintenance of that order; so that, by pursuing that course, should it happen in India as in Ceylon, instead of joining the insurgents, the natives, the great mass of the people, would be found helping to crush the insurrection, in conjunction with the Go-vernment. This will be the result in India if we give them cheap and good justice, and cheap and speedy appeal here, and mix them up in the business of the state, by employing them as jurors. By such simple means we shall be able to do more to secure our possessions in Iudia, than the whole army of sepoys can do for us. The hearts of his majesty's subjects in that quarter will be gained, and they will be conciliated and cemented into a bulwark of strength about the government, much more durable, and calculated to withstand the shocks of time better, than that which is presented by an armed force. composed of the very natives who are the objects of our rule. (Hear, hear ! )

Mr. Peel, in reply to the observations of Mr. Brougham on the subject of appeals, said that on this topic he thought the hou, and learned gentleman was misinformed, and concluded that he had collected his statements from the parliamentary returns, which were very likely to lead him into error, because these returns contained all the cases that had actually been compromised, and on which, therefore, appeals had not been formally made. This was one reason why the returns would lead to an erroneous conclusion. Another was, that they contained all the cases from Jersey and Guernsey, on which summonses had merely issued; and another was, they contained all the East-India appeals, for which no agent had appeared, and on which, therefore, the privy council could not adjudicate. At the same time he would say, that the state of the East-India appeals required consideration. The state of those before the privy council since 1800 was this: there had been from that period eighty appeals, on fifty-three of which no agent had appeared on either side; and on sixty-seven out of the eighty no case had been laid before the privy council. In point of fact, at the present moment, upon only six cases out of the eighty had written cases on both sides been laid before them, so that it was impossible for the privy council to proceed to adjudicate. Whether or not this proceeded from the ignorance of the natives of India, as to how they were to act, he could not take it on himself to say, and therefore he thought that the subject called for consideration.

Mr. C. W. W. Wynn spoke as follows. " I should have declined saying any thing on this occasion, were it not for my anxiety to offer a few words on the subject of those appeals to the Privy Council, to which the hon, and learned member has so earnestly directed our attention. The fact is, sir, that the delay and those other evils of which he complains, have arisen, in the cases he speaks of, not from any neglect on the part of the Privy Council, but because no instructions whatever have been given to prosecute these appeals from India; no agents have appeared -- no counsel have been instructed - and, consequently, no parties have come before the Privy Council whom they could hear. I apprehend that these deficiencies must have arisen from the difference between the courts of appeal in India and the courts of appeal in this country. Appeals in India are prosecuted in a much more summary manner than they ever are in this kingdom. In India, the course of such proceedings is, that when an appeal is instituted in the Superior Court, the Inferior Court transmits to the Superior all the proceedings, pleadings, and writings, which have been had and taken down in the original cause; and on these written documents, without hearing any additional arguments, the Superior Court determines summarily, whether the inferior jurisdiction has proceeded rightly or otherwise. Probably, therefore, and because this has long been the practice among them, the inhabitants of India may suppose that a similar course is adopted here. I do, however, agree most decidedly with the hon. and learned gent, that this defective system of appeals is an evil which, whether it arise from ignorance, misapprehension, or neglect, in the parties or their agents, should be remedied as soon as possible. I beg to assure the House, that the attention of the Privy Council has already been addressed to this subject, and it has been recommended by them, that the East-India Company should appoint an agent for such affairs, who, in all cases where the matter of the suit has not been properly investigated, or set forth in India, should be empowered and required to examine the papers, draw the pleadings, and in-struct the counsel, who shall be retained afterwards to bring the question before the Privy Council. Such, sir, is the course which the Privy Council have suggested, as proper to be taken on this head, to the East-India Company; and I have every reason to believe that it will shortly be carried into execution."

&lt;sup>a</sup> Mr. Brougham, we understand, read this fact, and others in his speech, from the Asiatic Journal, vol. xxiii. p. 807.

Mr. Brougham .- " I should be extremely sorry, if any thing which I have said should be thought to cast any reflection upon the Privy Council. Nothing has been further from my intentions than to impute to them the slightest misconduct, or disposition to delay justice. Never was there a man, I can safely affirm, more remarkably anxious -whether in appeals before the Privy Council or in cases occurring in his own particular court, more zealous to give judgment, (aye, sir, and with most remarkable despatch, too,) than the present Master of the Rolls. But so it was before his time; for I must say, that in the Privy Council, there was no objection either to the late Lord Gifford, or the Vice Chancellor, and still less to Sir William Grant, who, as Master of the Rolls, was always acknowledged to be one of the greatest judges who ever presided in this kingdom. Neither then nor now, so far as the learned judges who sit to hear appeals are concerned, has there been any want of despatch. But the mischief of which I complain is known only to professional men; and as such unfortunately it was rather forgotten, in the speech just now delivered by my right hon, and learned friend (Mr. Wynn). He well knows, however, that we cannot obtain hearings above nine or ten days in the year, so that, however numerous the appeals before the council may be, the allotted days are too few to permit of their being heard. We cannot go with them before the Chancellor, or the Master of the Rolls, or the judges of the Court of King's Bench, each in his own proper court; we must wait the sitting of the Privy Council on these nine or ten days. So that it is only upon one of these, or on some holiday, such as the 30th of January, that we have any chance of coming at all before a court of appeal, in which you dispose, in the imperfect manner and with the imperfect means I have described, of business of such immense importance! I hardly ever knew a cause determined there, in which less than from £50,000 to £60,000 was at stake. The colonial cases are not only, however, cases involving large properties, but they are usually of extreme importance in other respects also. It is my firm opinion, that many more causes would come before the Privy Council, if you could get rid, by more frequent sittings and a different system, of the delay which actually does intervene in the hearing of these appeals. The average delay between the entry and the decision, upon the last ten years, has been about four years and a half in each case; in some cases five, in others seven, and in others even twelve If you could dispose of them in six months, as you do in the House of Lords, you would have many more appeals, and that, I contend, would be for the benefit of the colonies themselves. I would entertain no appeals for delay; I would discourage them; I would say the delay is your own In respect to the appeals from India, and the number which the right hon, gent, opposite (Mr. Peel) assigns to them, my objection does not exactly apply to the matter which his observation is intended to meet. Part of these appeals which have been disposed of, let me repeat to him, were dismissed for want of prosecu-But, at all events, there can be no doubt of this fact: nine sittings have been the average number of the sittings of the Privy Council per annum, during the last ten years. With all the anxiety of the Master of the Rolls to get these appeals heard, we cannot get judges enough together, and often enough, in that court, to dispose of any. thing like the amount of business before

LAW.

PRIVY COUNCIL, January 30,*

Ruttonjee and another v. Cowasjee .- This was an appeal from Bombay, lodged 24th May 1823. The appellants were Rustomjee Ruttonjee Entee and Burgorjee Ruttonjee, Parsees, of Surat, against Eduljee Cowasjee. The appellants were the sons and executors of Ruttoniee Monackice Entee, who by will dated 26th October 1804, after leaving legacies to his wife, daughters, and servants, and giving directions as to his funeral ceremonies, proceeded thus: " All these expenses to be made from the shop; but after such reserve, whatever may remain, to remain in my paddy (house of business), and that the paddy be continued in my name till ten years after my decease, and that the peddy be under the control and management of my sons Rustomjee Ruttonjee and Burgorjee Ruttonjee, to both of whom I have given power and full control to carry it on; and that these both, under whose control and power the other persons are to be, is particular, (sic) Da-dabhoy Ruttonjee, Dhunjeebhoy Rutton-jee, Dossawbhoy Ruttonjee, and Heerjee Ruttonice. These all sons to live together on the expenses of the paddy, or at the expense from the general funds, or if any one should disagree, who shall have a thousand rupees for his maintenance every year to be paid. This is the way to continue

• The appeals from India are of such manifest importance, particularly as they afford rules for the future guidance of the inferior courts, that we have made arrangements for procuring authentic reports (as in the above cases) of the decisions of the Privy Council in all appeals from India.—Eb. continue for ten years; after which all of them may divide in equal shares, and share alike." The will concluded with a denunciation against any one who should dis-regard it. The testator died in November 1804, leaving his sons named in the will surviving and of full age. The appellants managed the paddy as directed, and no one of the sons disagreed so as to be entitled to the annual allowance of 1,000 rupees. Shortly after the testator's death, the appellants were applied to by Heerjee Ruttonjee for an advance of money out of his prospective share; and the appellants not being aware of any considerable claims on the estate, advanced to their brother Hecrice. in 1805, two sums of 53,000 rupees and 235 rupces, taking as security, in case the estate should require repayment, two notes of hand bearing interest, as they did in the case of another advance to Dhunjeebhov Ruttonjee in 1817. Some time after this, and after the appellants had made Heerice further advances, he left Surat in 1817, and had not since been heard of.

Some time previous to the death of the testator, commercial dealings to a very considerable extent had existed between him and one Dadabhoy Nasserwanjee, since deceased, and his son and successor, Ardaseer Dady, also since deceased, which dealings were continued by the appellants, as managers of the testator's paddy, till Ardaseer Dady's death in 1810, in embarrassed cir-The appellants, shortly after comstances Ardascer Dady's death, commenced an action against his executors in the Recorder's Court of Bombay, for the sum which appeared due on the balance of accounts; when the executors of Ardascer Dady set up a cross demand for a sum due to their testator's estate from the estate of the father of the appellants. These counter-claims led to a long and expensive htigation, which had not terminated at the period fixed by the testator for the division of his property among his sons. Pending these litigations, and soon after Heerjee had quitted Surat, the respondent instituted proceedings against Heerjee in the Adawlut Court at Surat, to recover a sum alleged to be due from him to the respondent for the rent of a garden; and on the 3d March 1817 he obtained an exparte judgment against Heerjee for 1,631 rupees. Shortly after, by a representation to the court that the sixth part of the testator's estate had descended to Heerjee, the respondent obtained an order to advertise for sale the house of the testator at Surat, though it was then in possession of the uppellants or their tenant. The appellants, resisting the demand of the respondent, commenced an action in the Court of Adamlut for 15,000 rupees, as the probable value of the house, for the purpose of removing the attachment; but although the appellants had made it appear that they Asiatic Journ. Vol. 25. No. 147.

were prevented from making a division of the testator's property, by the pendency of the proceedings on the part of the executors of Ardaseer Dady, and that they had advanced to Heerice more than his probable share, the Court gave judgment, 18th June 1818, against the appellants, recommending them to discharge the amount of the decree against Heerjee, and enter it as an additional item in their account against The appellants appealed from this decree to the Court of Appeal at Surat, which court, on the 19th March 1819, affirmed the decree. In June 1819, the appellants appealed to the Court of Sudder Adawlut at Bombay, insisting, in addition, that at the time Heerjee quitted the premises rented by him of the respondent, he left behind property more than sufficient to discharge the claim of the respondent. The Court of Sudder Adawlut, however, on the 15th July 1820, affirmed the decree with costs and interest. From this decision the present appeal was lodged,

After an exparte hearing, no counsel appearing for the respondent,

The Master of the Rolls delivered the judgment of the court. by which their lordships were pleased to declare that the respondent had no other claim against the property of the testator, in the hands of the appellants, as his executors and trustees, than such as could be enforced by the suit of Heerjee himself against the appellants; by which he could recover only such sums as would appear to be due to him after giving credit to the appellants for the sums due on the two promissory notes, and for all other sums advanced by the appellants to him or his order; and their lordships further declared, that if any sum were upon a general account between Heerjee and the appellants, found to be due from them to him, yet that the payment could not be enforced by the sale of the house, which is the object of the attachment, and in which all the sont of the testator have a common interest under his will, and in which it does not appear that the appellants had acquired a separate and independent interest. The court, therefore, reversed the decree of the Sudder Court of Adawlut of the 15th July 1820, and the decree of the Court of Appeal at Surat of the 18th March 1819, and the decree of the Assistant-Judge of the Adawlut Court of Surat of the 18th June 1818; and faither, removed the attachment affixed on the house in question in execution of the decree obtained by the respondent against Heerjee Ruttonjee.

Ramtonoo Mullick, Ramconnai Mullick, Ronnmounn Mullick, Hirralaul Mullick, Surroopchurder Mullick, and Muttylaul Mullick, appellants; Ramgopaul Mullick, and Ramrutton Mullick, respondents. This was an appeal from an order of the S If Supreme Court of Calcutta, 13th February 1813, directing an issue at law; and from a decretal order of the 18th February 1814, pronounced on the finding at law; in a cause wherein the above-named appellants were complainants, and the above-named respondents were defendants. The appeal was lodged 29th December 1824.

The Master of the Rolls pronounced the judgment of their lordships; in this case, Nemychurn Mullick, a native Hindoo of Bengal, died possessed of very considerable wealth, ancestorial and self-acquired, 24th October 1807, leaving eight sons, to whom he had bequeathed his property,* appointing the two eldest (the respondents) executors of his will. Shortly after his decease, the six younger children (the appellants) filed a bill against the two elder, for an account and distribution, and a decree was pronounced accordingly. In the investigation before the master, the appellants contended that fifteen government decennial securities were part of the property of the testator, and ought to be accounted for by the executors; who, on the other hand, maintained that these securities were the exclusive property of the eldest son, by virtue of a bond fide sale. The court directed a separate report as to these securities from the master, who found that they formed part of the testator's estate. Exceptions were taken to this report, and the court directed an issue at law, the result of which the appellants now sought to set aside. They alleged, first, that the form of the issue was wrong and injurious to them, inasmuch as it directed one of the appellants to be plaintiff, thereby throwing upon him the difficulty of establishing that these securities belonged to their father's estate. But it was the opinion of their lordships that the form of the issue was greatly advantageous to the appellants: for it was admitted that the securities were originally Nemychurn's property, therefore the onus lay upon the defendant to shew how he acquired them; and the plaintiff would be entitled to re-The next ground of complaint was, that the court ought not to have directed an issue, but should have acted upon the master's report. Their lordships were of a different opinion: they thought that the evidence before the master was not such as to justify his report, or to call upon the supreme court to act upon it. His honour then adverted to the evidence before the master, observing that out of three witnesses on behalf of the plaintiff, who deposed to the manner of Bengalee bookkeeping, and the entries in Nemychurn's books, one swore that under the head "amanut cottah," the securities must have been Nemychurn's; another that they could not have been his; and a third that they

 Each of the eight sons had a specific legacy of 3,00,000 rupees, besides a share of the residue. might or might not have been his. On other points the witnesses were equally at variance. His honour in continuation observed, that the evidence before the master ought to have inclined him to a contrary conclusion, and that the court acted very properly in directing an issue in the form stated. As to the result of the trial, it was obvious that the judges who presided had the advantages of viva voce examina. tion of the witnesses, which this court had not; and as they were of opinion, after a long examination of all the witnesses, that Ramgopaul Mullick had established his right to the securities in question, their lordships felt no disposition to disturb their decision. - Appeal dismissed,

On the 9th February their lordships made the following order: That in future appeal causes shall take precedence in hearing according to the order in which they are ready for hearing, and not as at present, according to the order in which the first printed case is lodged upon each appeal.

HIGH COURT OF DELEGATES, Feb. 13.

The Atlas.—This case, which has been reported in our last volume, was brought by appeal before this court, when their lordships, after a very long argument and upon very mature consideration, confirmed the decision of Lord Stowell, thereby pronouncing in effect that the bond in question was was not a valid bottomry-bond.

MISCELLANEOUS.

NEW BOARD OF COMMISSIONERS FOR THE AFFAIRS OF INDIA.

Viscount Melville (president), Right Hon. Robert Peel, the Earl of Dudley, Right Hon William Huskisson, the Duke of Wellington, Right Hon. Henry Goulburn, Lord Wallace, Right Hon. John Sullivan, Lord Ashley, the Marquess of Graham, and Lawrence Peel, Esq.—Lond. Gaz. Feb. 5.

MR. WYNN'S WRITERSHIP.

Oxford, Feb. 14.—" The right hon. C. W. W. Wynn, M. P., having handsomely offered as a prize for competition among the junior members of the University, a writership belonging to the patronage in a tenter of the Lonical Company's service; in a convocation held this morning, the thanks of the University were voted to Mr. C. W. Wynn for this liberal mark of his attention; and his offer of a writership was unanimously accepted."

CAPT. GRINDLAY'S VIEWS OF INDIA.

The fourth part of this splendid work has just appeared : it contains six excuisite plates, representing scenery and architecture in various parts of India, the colouring of which exhibits the rich and delicate hues given by the climate itself. The subjects are the British residences at Hyderabad (court of the Nizam); the Roza, or tomb of the Vizier of Sultan Mahmood, at Mehmoodabad in Guzerat, a beautiful piece from Capt. Grindlay's pencil; fishing off Bombay during the mousoon, with a part of the harbour; view of the peculiar bridge near Baroda, with three tiers of arches (to obviate the sudden increase of the river), built in the reign of Sultan Ahmed; the town and pass of Boondee, and a view near Tonk, both in Rajpootana, and both from the pencil of the late Capt. Auber. The latter are amongst the most beautiful pieces in the collection.

COL. DALLAS AND SIR C. MALCOLM.

A Court of Directors was held at the East-India House on the 6th Feb., when Col. Charles Dallas took the usual oath on being appointed governor of St. Helena. Capt. Sir Charles Malcolm, R. N., C.B., also took the oath on being appointed Superintendent of the Bombay Marine.

The Colonel and Sir Charles afterwards dined with the Directors at the London Tavern.

SCOTT, THE DESERTER.

A short time ago we copied from the London papers an official document, promulgated in India, respecting this military delinquent, which, we dare say, our readers have not yet forgotton. Scott, a Lieut. in his Majesty's 47th regiment, deserted from the British army during the progress of the expedition sent against the Burmese up the Irawaddy. At the termination of the war he was surrendered to his countrymen, and escaped punishment only by a clause in the treaty of peace which could not be violated without compromising British honour. As the official paper referred to gave no particulars of his offence, we are induced to lay the following facts before our readers, as communicated to us by an officer lately returned from India, who saw Scott a prisoner in the British camp. Scott, on being given up to the British, and interrogated as to the motives which had induced him to turn a traitor to his country, denied that he had voluntarily descrited his colours. According to his statement, and it tallied with his habits, he had ventured into the jungle, accompanied by two natives, one of them a boy, his servant, with several hundred rupees in his purse, to purchase a native woman. was on horseback, and while riding heedlessly forward, fell into an ambuscade.

Seeing his danger he wheeled about his horse and attempted to fly, but in trying to cross a narrow wooden bridge, across a gully, the animal came down with him, and he was taken along with his com-panions. The boy, who could speak English, alarmed him by an account of the terrible tortures which were in reserve for English prisoners; and apprehensive of being sacrificed by his captors, he deprecated their wrath by declaring that he had purposely left the British standard, and had come over to offer his services to his Birman Majesty. This confession instantly secured him good treatment. He was sent to Ammerapoora with some pomp; and finding that the assurance of his being one having authority in his own nation, would redound to his honour with his majesty of Ava, he boldly proclaimed himself Colonel of the 47th regiment, and a son of the King of England. The romance was favourably received. He daily waxed greater and greater in the estimation of his goldenfooted majesty: when, unfortunately, a medical officer belonging to the Royals, who had fallen into the enemy's hands, also arrived at the capital, and by his plain unvarnished statement speedily reduced the impostor to his proper station. Scott was subsequently treated with considerable severity by the Burmese; and, as we have said, only escaped punishment from his countrymen, by an article in the treaty, which pledged them to pardon him. -Edinburgh Observer.

NEW TREASURER TO THE COMPANY.

Charles Mortimer, Esq. has been appointed by the Hon. the Court of Directors to the office of treasurer to the East-India Company, vacant by the death of John A. Gilmour, Esq.; and J. R. Vincent, Esq. has been appointed to succeed Mr. Mortimer as deputy.

PROMOTIONS AND CHANGES IN THE BRITISH ARMY

(SERVING IN THE EAST.)

4th L.Dr. Capt. E. Cormick, from h.p. 20th L.D., to be paym., v. Wm. Wildey placed on h.p. (24 Jan. 28).

11th L.Dr. Corn. W. Roebuck to be lieut. by purch., v. Williamson, who retires; C. T. Warrington to be corn. by purch., v. Roebuck (both 31 Jan. 28).

16th L.Dr. P. Bonham to be corn. by purch., v. Cotton prom. (10 Jan. 28).

2d Foot. Jas. Stirling to be ens. by purch., v. Daniell prom. (10 Jan. 28).

3d Foot. Lieut. G. L. Christie to be capt. by puch., v. Innes prom.; Ens. A. Irvine to be lieut., v. Christie; W. White to be ens. by purch., v. Irvine (all 17 Jan. 28).

6th Foot. Brev. Col. C. Bruce, from h.p. 69th F., to be lieut. col., v. M. Napier, who exch. (10 Jan. 29); Capt. P. Cheape, from h.p., to be capt., v. O. Barwell who exch. (24 Jan.)

20th Foot. Ens. J. Taylor to be lieut., v. Oakley prom.; E. Dalgety to be ens., v. Taylor (both 3 Jan. 28).

Sist Foot. Capt. L. B. Urmston, from h.p., to be capie, y. L. Nuin, who exch. (13 Feb. 28); Leut., W. N. Strode, from h.p. Siellian regt., to be lieut., v. Lillie app. to 59th F. (2 Jan.); Lieut. R. Bjnney, from h.p., to be lieut. v. O'Hara, whose app. has not taken place (17 Jan.)

whose app. nas not taken place (17 Jan.) 38th Foot. Lieut. W. Kelly, from h.p. 53d F., to be lieut., v. E. O'Halforan, who exch. (24 Jan. 28); Ens. J. J. Grant to be lieut., v. Urmston prom.; W. C. Symonds to be ens. by purch. (both 12 Feb.)

30th Foot. A. Thompson to be ens. by purch., v. Spencer prom. (8 Jan. 23).

Spencer prom. (8 Jan. 28).

40th Fuot. Maj. T. Kirkwood to be licut. col. by purch., v. Balfour app. to 82d F.; Capt. P. Bishop to be maj. by purch., v. Kirkwood; Licut. R.
Floyer to be capt. by purch., v. Bishop (all 17 Jan.
20); Ens. F. Coddington to be lleut. by purch., v.
Floyer (17 Jan.); Licut. D. M'Andrew, from h.p.
27th F., to be lleut., v. R. J. Kerr who exch. (18 Jan.); H. B. Rogers to be ens. by purch., v. Coddington (17 Jan.); Licut. G. A. Stanley, from Newfoundland Vet. Comps., to be heut., v. Gun, whose app. has not taken place.

whose app. has not taken place.

41st Post. Lieut. J. Dawson to be capt., v. Butterfield dcc. (17-Jan. 20); Ens. J. Boyse to be lieut.

(20) Oct. 26); Ens. S. G. Stoddiard to be lieut.

v. Dawson (17 Jan. 20); J. Fry to be ens., v. Stod(16 Jan.); W. H. Fitzgerald to be ens., v. Stoddard (17 Jan.); Ens. C. W. P. Magra to be lieut.

(31 Jan.); W. May to be ens. by purth, v. Fitzgerald app. to 60th F. (30 Jan.); — Chambers to be ens., v. Magra (31 Jan.); Lieut. W. Dyer to be adj., v. Coultan prom. (31 Jan.)

45th Foot. Ens. W. Elliot to be lieut. by purch., v. Coke, whose prom. by purch, has been cancelled (31 Jan. 28).

54th Foot. Lieut. C. Barlow, from h.p. Sicilian Regt., to be paym., v. Smith dec. (3 Jan. 28).

57th Foot. Licut. Col. Hon. G. Catheart, from h.p., to be licut. col., v. Carcy app. inspecting field officer of militia in Ioilan Islands (21 Jan. 28).

59th Foot, Lieut. T. Lillie, from 31st F., to be lieut., v. Blackburn, app. to 17th F. (2 Jan. 28). 88th Foot. Lieut. C. Arrow to be capt. by purch., v. Young prom.; Ens. C. Cameron, from 79th F., to be lieut. by purch., v. Arrow (both 12 Feb. 20).

97th Fact. Ens. S. Chetham, from b. p., to be ens., v. Mansergh, app. to 50th F. (17 Jan. 28).

Ceylon Regt. E. Holgate to be 2d-lient., v. Rod-ney, who resigns (1 Jan. 28.); F. B. Bayley to be 2d-lieut., v. Stephenson, who resigns (2 Jan.); H. Smith to be 2d-lieut., v. Jefferson prom. (3 Jan.); S. N. Burres to be 2d-lieut., v. Borton who retires

The 26th (Cameronian) regiment of infantry has received orders to hold itself in readiness to embark for Madias.

The 58th (Rutlandshire) and the 61st (South Gloucestershire) regiments of foot have received orders to prepare for embarkation for Ceylon.

The 16th (Beddforshire) is ordered, on being relieved at Ceylon, to return to India.

The 83d regiment of infantry is ordered, being relieved at Ceylon, to return to England. The 72d (Duke of Albany's own Highlanders) as received orders to prepare for embarkation, for the Cape of Good Hope. The 49th (the Hertfordshire) infantry is ordered, on being relieved at the Cape of Good Hope, to proceed to India.

INDIA SHIPPING.

Artivals.

Aricals.

Jan. 20. Eugle, Batty, from Cape of Good Hope 21st Nov.: at Bristol (for Liverpool).—Feb. 5. William and Ann. from Ceylon 24th Aug.: at Deal.—I. Topac, Stroyan, from the Mauritius 20th Oct.; at Deal.—II. Eliza Jane, Liddell, from the Mauritius 6th Nov.; at Porsmouth,—also, Pyramus, Johnson, from the Mauritius 3d Nov.; at Cowes (for Rotterdam).—I. A Maycelly, Giles, from Batavia 31st Oct.; at Cowes (for Rotterdam).—I. A Maycelly, Dawson, from Bengal 3d Sept. (with loss of anchors and cables); off Margite,—also, Esther, Robinson, from Bombay 11th Sept., and Cape 20th Nov.; and Derby, Putman, from Bombay 12th Sept., and Cape 20th Nov.; and Derby, Putman, from Batavia 20th Oct. for Answerp! both off Dover.—16. Clyde, Scott, from Bombay 11th Oct.; at Liverpool,—also, Affred, Pearson, from China 14th Oct.; aff Plymouth.—17. Mary, Laird, from Cape of Good Hope 6th Dec.; at Deal,—also David Scott, Thormhill, from Bengal 10th Sept., and Madras 13th Oct.; off Portamouth.—18. Thumes, Warming, from Bengal 21st Sept.; and Madeline, Coghan, from Bangal 21st Sept.; and Madeline, Coghan, from Bangal 21st Sept.; and Madeline, Coghan, from Bangal 21st Sept.; and Cowes.—19. Susanne, De Trilo, from Bengal 21st Sept.; and Cowes.—19. Susanne, De Trilo, from Bengal 21st Sept.; and Cowes.—19. Susanne, Joe Trilo, from Bengal 21st Sept.; and Cowes.—19. Susanne, Joe Trilo, from Bengal 21st Sept.; and Cowes.—21st Susanne, Joe Trilo, from Hengal 21st Sept.; and Cape 18th Dec.; both at Cowes,—also, Concertia, Keyser, from Batavia 20th Oct.; off St. Albania Head,—also, Pomona, Highat, from Bombay 14th Oct.; off Holyhead,—21. Isabelia, Parker, from Bengal 3d Oct.; at Grivesend,—also, Janes Sibbaid, Forbes, from Calcutta 17th Aug., Madras 18th Oct., and St. Helena 3d Jan.; off Newhaven,—also, Counters of Haccourte, Harrison, from the Mauritius 27th Nov.; off the Wight.—23. Braobornebury, Few. son, from China 18th Oct.; off the Lizard,—also, Orpheus, Duff, from Batavia 22th Oct.; at Cowes (for Antwerp).—24. Chales Kerr. Brodle, from Bombay, 7th Oct., and Cape 31st Dec.; off the Wight.—25. Eurl of Experiment, Johnson, from the Mauritius 6th Nov.; and Brassian, Cotsworth, from Meto 22th Nov.; and Brassian, Cotsworth, from Me worth, from ditto 20th Nov.; both at Deal.

Departures.

Jan. 29. Madras, Christian, for Bengal; Othelbo, Thompson, for Bengal; and Alegone, Mult, for Bombay; all from Liverpool,—380, Surah, Bateman, for N. S. Wales, from Portsmouth.—30. Charles Jameson, Christie, for Cape of Good Hope, from Deal.—31. Le Normand, Gilner, for Bourbon and Mauritus; from Liverpool.—EA.

7. Margar at Johnson, Sowerby, for Cape, Manritus, and Bombay; from Liverpool.—S. Margars of Hientlere, Frazer, for Melropool.—S. Margars of Hientlere, Frazer, for Interpool.—EA.

7. Margar at Johnson, Sowerby, for Cape, Manritus, and Bombay; from Liverpool.—S. Margars of Hientlere, Frazer, for Liverpool.—EA.

7. Margar at Johnson, Sowerby, for Cape, Manritus, and Rombay; Armstrung, for Cape of Good Hope; all from Coxes,—8bo.—Hoppo, Poppin, for Batavia, Hornley, Hernley, Lord, Grantley, Margar at Margar at Margar and China; and Rising Stur, Gillies, for Bombay both from Deal.—180, Numa, Wade, and Cleepar, Young, both for N.S. Wales; from Cove of Cork.—II. General Pulmer, Truscott, for Madras and Bengal; from Portsmouth.—12. Alexander, Oglivie, for Batavia and Singapore; Boroduo, Mentrup, for ditto ditto; and Leep Ann. Sunpson, for N. S. Wales; all from Cove of Cork.—10. General Pulmer, Truscott, for Madras and Bombay; for Batavia and Singapore; Boroduo, Mentrup, for ditto ditto; and Leep Ann. Sunpson, for N. S. Wales; all from Cove of Cork.—10. General Pulmer, Truscott, for Madras and Bombay; from Deal.—21. Alexander, Oglivie, for Batavia and Singapore; Boroduo, Mentrup, for ditto ditto; and Leep Ann. Sunpson, for N. S. Wales; all from Cove of Cork.—10. General Pulmer, Truscott, for Madras and Bombay; from Deal.—22. Alexander, Oglivie, for Batavia and Singapore; Boroduo, Mentrup, for ditto ditto; and Leep Ann. Sunpson, for N. S. Wales; all from Cove of Cork.—10. General Pulmer, Truscott, for Madras and China; and Aliston, Mentrup, for Cape and Bombay; from Deal.—21. Alexander, Oglive, for Batavia and Bombay; from Deal.—22. Alexander, Oglive, for Batavia and Bom

PASSENGERS FROM INDIA.

Per Marcelly, from Bengal: Mrs. Crews; Miss H. Holyoake; Capt. Morie, H.M.'s 14th Foot; Capt. H. Burt; Mr. J. Wilson.

Per Topaz, from the Mauritius; Lieut P. Fitz-gerald, H.M.'s 29th regt.

Per Alfred, from China: Mr. Jas. Illberry, merchant.

Per Madeline, from Bengal, Mauritius, &c.: Capt. Parkers from the Mauritius; Capt. Coclirane, from Bengal; Mr. and Mrs. Serjeant, and Mr. Robinson, from the Cape.

Per Thames, Warming, from Bengal: Lieut-Sykes, H.M.'s 45th Foot; Mr. W. Brandon.

Per Palamban, from Bombay (at Greenock) Capt. F. Bowes; Capt. W. Eyre; Mr. J.

Per Indian Chief, from Bengal (arrived at Liver-pool in Nov. last.) Mr. Jas. Stewart, merchant; Lieut. Col. J. Fuller; Mrs. Fuller; two Misses and two Masters Fuller.

per Othello, from Bengal (arrived at Liverpool in Oct. last): Mrs. A. Burns; W. Earle, Esq.; Capt. J. Kennedy; Lleut. W. Ellis; two Misses Burns; two servants.

Butns; two servanus.

Per David Scott, from Madras: Mrs. Col. Read;
Mrs. Mai, Basdon; Miss Read; Misses Ann Douglas and Martha Douglas; Capt. Wetherall, R.N.;
Maj, Basdon, H.M.'s Byth Foot; Capt. Triphook,
H.M.'s 18th Foot; Lieut. Kershaw, étto; Capt.
Cove; Capt. Claude; Lieut. Bolton; Lieut.
Dearsley; Dr. O'Nell.

Dearsley; Dr. O'Neil.

Per James Sibbaid, from Madras; Mrs. Newmarch and child; Mrs. Armstrong; Dr. M'Leod; Maj. Ewing, 1st Madras N.I.; Capt. M'Donald, Royals; Lleut. Fothergill, commanding invalida of H.M.'s 48th regt.; Capt. Metcalfe, Madras N.I.; Lieut. Currle, 9th ditto: Ens. Colbeck, 4th ditto; Lieut. Armstrong, H.M.'s 39th Regt.; Mr. Tabor; Masters Lambe and Metcalfe; 30 invalids; 9 women; 6 children.

Per Countess of Harcourt, from the Mauritius: Dr. Goodsell, R.N.; Mr. James.

Dr. Goodseii, R.N.; Mr. James.

Per Charles Kerr, from Bombay: Mrs. Brodle;
Mrs. Denham; Mrs. Peirson; Col. Wahab; Maj.
Morrison, Capt. Walte; Lieut. Rowley; Lieut.
Riley; Mr. Wooler; two Misses Denham; Misses Wahab, Swainston, and Lord; Mr. Denham; two Masters Denham; two Masters Kaye; Master Swainston; 6 servants; one invalid.—From the Cape: W. Watkin, Esq.; Mrs. Clark.

PASSENGERS TO INDIA.

Per Sir David Scott, for Bengal: Maj. Gen. the Earl of Carnwath, H.M.'s staff, Bengal: Capt. A. Smith, H.C.'s service; Messra, J. S. Kindoch, C. E. Grant, and R. Mathison, cadets: Messra. T. Waghorn and John Higglins, volunteers, pilot service; Capt. R. A. M. Naghten, H.C.'s service; Irs. L. M. Naghten; Mr. H. Fulton, assist surg.; Misses E. Roberts, A. Rich, C. Perelra, and H. Perenra; Messra. W. F. Schneider, J. Barrell, H. Daniell, and Jas. Taylor; 150 Company's recruits; Issoidlers' wives; 4 children.

Per Berwickshire, for Bengal! Capt. Marshall, H.C.'s service, commanding recruits; Mr. E. Wil-mot, writer; Mr. H. Russell, cadet; Mr. C. Hut-chins; 85 Company's recruits; 3 wives of ditto; one child.

Per Marquis of Huntly, for Bengal: Lieut. Col. Wm. Brooks; Rev. John Jackson, chaplan; Mr. T. Jackson, free merchant; Mr. E. J. Yateman, assist. surg.; Messrs. J. R. Keane and C. G. Fagan, acdets; Mr. J. Hawker, free marlner; Mr. Geo. Even; Misses H. Jeremle, G. Jeremle, A. Jeremle, and E. Jeremle, an

Mr. R. H. Mathews; 91 Company's recruits.

Per Rediunce, for Bengal; Rev. J. D. Wintle, chaplan; Mesrs. W. S. Donnithorne and R. M.
P. Clarke, writers; Mr. Shelton, assist surg.;
Mesrs. W. G. Don, J. R. Abbot, A. Arnstrong, J. H. Campbell, R. Macklin, and J. Erskine, calets; Mr. Wilson; Misses E. Erskine and M. A.
Erskine; Capt. Milne, Cornet Salkeld, and Cornet Phibbs, H.M.'s 11th L. Dr.; Lieut. Pitman, Leut. Jones, Lieut. Deveell, Cornet Simpson,
Cornet Donnithorne, and Cornet Ager, H. M.'s Ibolt Lancers; 132 privates H.M.'s 11th Dr. and löth Lancers; 11 soldiers' wives; 7 children of ditto. ditto.

ditto.

Per Duchess of Athol, for Bombay and China: Capt. Str. Chas. Malcolm, R.N., superintendent of the Bombay marine; Lieut. Malcolm, alid-decamp to Sir John Malcolm; Major Simcock, and Capt. Oakley, H.M.; 20th Foot; Lieut. Sparkin, H.M.; ath. L.Dr.; Lieut. Fylen, Lieut. O'Kelly, Eas. Frayer, Ens. Rodgers, and Ens. Wood, H.M.; 20th Foot; Cornet Lloyd, H.M.; ath. L.Dr.; Cornet Eloyd, H.M.; ath. L.Dr.; Cornet Rickards, returning to Bombay; Mrs. Moyle; Mrs. Sparkin; two Misses White: two Misses Adams; Mrs. Furlong; Mrs. Lloyd; Messrs. Gordon and Dyke, writers; Messrs. Livingston, Davidson, and Bergerle, assistaurgs; Messrs. Evans, Wells, Turnbull, Annelsey, Balmbridge, Nixon, Brown, Rose, Prendergrast, Wilmot, Seaton, Burthorn, and Lodge, Cadet; Messrs. Campbell, Twiddell, Gordon, Danlell, and Jerdine, volunders, Bombay marine; Messrs. Thacker, Hitcher, Son chings, Shepherd, Lynch, and Walker, volun-teers, pilot service; Mr. A. T. Weir, free mari-ner; Mr. Dent, Bombay marine; Mr. Lackie and Per Arabian (recently sailed from Liverpool), for Bengal: Lieut. Col. W. C. Baddeley; Mrs. Baddeley; two Misses Baddeley; Master Baddeley; two Misses Holdsworth; Misses Manael and Younger; Messrs. Baddeley and Tulloch, cadeta; Messrs. Holdsworth, Howatth, Harper, Bell, Alexander, Bates, and Healy.

BIRTHS, MARRIAGES, AND DEATHS.

DIDMITO

BIRTHS.

Jan. 25. In York Street, Portman Square, the lady of Chas. H. C. Plowden, Esq., of a son. 29. At Edinburgh, the lady of J. R. Hutchinson, Esq., Bengal civil service, of a so, 28. Bengal civil service, of a so, 3d Bengal cavalry, of a daughter.

11. At Edinburgh, the lady of Colonel Limond, of the Madras artillery, of a daughter.

— At Woodlands, Chigwell, Essex, the lady of Sir James Urnston, of a son.

20. At Chelsea, the lady of Mr. G. M. Bratthwalte, chief officer of the H.C.'s ship General Harris, of a son.

MARRIAGES.

MARRIAGES.

Jan. 14. At Lurgyvallen, county of Armagh, Ireland, John Macan, Eaq., of the Bengal military service, to Jessie, only daughter of Wm. Campbell, Eaq., of Edinburgh.

29. At St. James's, Westminster, M. Grierson, Esq., of the Hon. E. I. Conpany's service, to Anne, second daughte. of J. Halliday, Esq., of Dam, Dumfreshire.

Feb. 4. At Edinburgh, Mr. Wm. Parkin, of East Keswick, Yorkshire, to Isabella Wallace, second daughter of the late Mr. G. Heron, Hon. E. I. Company's service, Kirkaldy.

12. The Rev. W. S. Robinson, B. A., rector of Dyrham, in the diocese of Gloucester, to Mailda Maxwell Innes, daughter of John Innes, Esq., of Broad Street Buildings.

19. At Cirencester, H. E. Rutherford, Esq., of the Cape of Good Hope, to Emma, third daughter of John Masters, Esq., of Crencester.

Lately, At St. Martin's in the Fields, H. Hare, Esq., late of Calcutta, to Jame, second daughter of W. W. Bradley, Esq., of Sandwich.

— At Quedgley, H. Nisbet, Esq., of the Bengalcivil service, to Anne, second daughter of the Jate Rev. J. A. Curtis, vicar of Bitton, and Mrs. Curtis Hayward, of Quedgley House.

DEATHS.

Jan. 28. At St. Andrew's, Lieut. Gen. David Campbell.

At Vienna, Prince Alexander Ypsilanti, who first raised the standard of independence in Greece, Fabb. 3. In Bryanistone Square, Admiral Sir Richard John Strachan.
12. Leutt Gen. Schalch, of the Royal artillery, 19. In Portland Place, Lieut. Gen. Burr, in his 79th year.

GOODS DECLARED FOR SALE AT THE EAST-INDIA HOUSE.

For Sale 3 March-Prompt 30 May. Tea.— Bohea, 1,150,000 fb.; Congou, Campol, Pckoe, and Souchong, 5,200,000 fb.; Twankay and Hyson-Skin, 1,100 000 fb.; Hyson, 250,000 fb.— Total, including Private-Trade, 7,700,000 fb.

For Sale 11 March-Prompt 6 June.

Company's-Bengal and Coast Piece Goods, and Calico Wrappers.

Triotte-Trade.—Sallampores—Blue Sallampores—Blue Cloths—Nankeens and Blue Nankeens—Blue Cloths—Nankeens and Blue Nankeens—Bandannos—Corahs—Slik Piece Good—China Wrought Silks—Shawls—Cashmare Shawls—Crapes—Crapes—Crape Handkerchiefs—Crape Tippets—Scarfs—Slik Choppah Romals—Damasks.

For Sale 15 April-Prompt 11 July. Company's .- Indigo.

1 2 d 1

. The Court of Directors, with reference to their printed advertisements of May and August last, have given notice, that, in pursuance of the letter from the Hon, Board of Customs, dated 14th April 1827, they have caused lists to be prepared of certain goods, &c. imported up to the 31st Dec. 1815, and of other goods, &c. imported up to 5th July 1821, which have remained warehoused longer than allowed by law, except those upon which further time for remaining in warehouse has been granted.-That the lists may be inspected by applying to the Company's Warehouse-keepers, by whom information respecting the goods will be given to holders of warrants or other persons interested therein, and Catalogues will be printed forthwith.—That all Goods, see above described, which shall not be actually cleared out of the Company's Warehouses on Monday the 28th April, will be sold, or re-sold, as the case may be, at the Company's Sale, on Tuesday, the 29th April 1828.

CARGO of EAST-INDIA COM-

PANY'S SHIPS lately arrived.

CARGOES of the Alfred and Brosbornebury. from China.

Company's .- Teas.

Private-Trade and Privilege .- Teas-Silks-Raw Silk—Seed Coral Beads—Gamboge—Whanghee Canes—Bamboo Canes—Table Mats—Floor Mats

독순취목

|                  | LIST                  | f SHIPS trading                          | 8 20 | LIST of SHIPS trading to INDIA and Eastward of the CAPE of GOOD HOPE.                                                                                                                          | rd of the CAPE                                                                                                                     | of GOO                                    | D HOPE.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                        |
|------------------|-----------------------|------------------------------------------|------|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-------------------------------------------|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| Destination.     | Appointed to east.    | Ships' Name.                             | -uoL | Owners or Consignees.                                                                                                                                                                          | Captains.                                                                                                                          | Where loading.                            | Reference for Freight or Passage.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                              |
|                  | 1826M arch | 1828.March 15 Ganges                 |      | Richard Lloyd                                                                                                                                                                                  | Richard Lloyd                                                                                                                      | City Canal                                | 440 Richard LloydRichard Lloyd City CanalJ. S. Brinley, and W. Abercomble 411 (Chalmers and Gutbrie Francis HuntW. I. Docks Barber, Neate, & Co., Clement's-bar                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                |
|                  | Forte.                | 15 \ Victory                             |      | loseph L. Heathorn                                                                                                                                                                             | Chas. Farquharson                                                                                                                  | W. I. Docks                               | 712 Joseph L. Heathorn Chas. Farquharson W. I. Docks Joseph L. Heathorn, Birchin-lane.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         |
| ٠.               | April                 | 10 Africa20 Vesp:rApril 15 Boyne |      | William Tindell                                                                                                                                                                                | John SkeltonDavid BrownWm. L. Pope                                                                                         | W. I. DocksW. I. DocksE. I. Docks | 350 William Tindell                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                            |
| Madras & Bengal  | MayApril          | 25 Lord Lymedoch                         |      | 632 Samuel Beadle                                                                                                                                                                              | Samuel Besdle                                                                                                                      | W. I. Docks                               | 622 Samuel Beadle Samuel Beadle W. I. Docks Bolton and Kelham, Fenchurch et.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                   |
|                  |                       |                                          |      | reorge Joad                                                                                                                                                                                    | Thomas Boyes                                                                                                                       | W. I. Docks                               | 50 George Josd                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                 |
|                  | Graves.               | Fairlie                                  |      | A. F. Gordon                                                                                                                                                                                   | Steph. J. Fuller                                                                                                                   | E. I. Docks                               | 755 M. F. Gordon Steph. J. Fuller E. J. Docks Capt. Fuller, Jerusslem Coffee-How                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               |
| Beneat           | March 2               | 15 Juleana                               |      | 350 Gledstanes, Drysdale&Co, Chas. B. Tarbutt E. I. Docks 800 Henry Templer                                                                                                                    | Charles Arkcoll                                                                                                                    | E. I. DocksE. I. Docks                | Wm. Abercrombie, Birchin-lane,J. Lachlan, Aluest., Goodman's-fdsE. Read, Riche's-court, Lime-streel                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                    |
|                  | 5i                    | 20 London                                |      | William Driscoll L Battersby                                                                                                                                                                   | Geo, Wm. TomimHenry Bevan Guy                                                                                                  | ity Canal.                                | 339' Batterby                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                  |
| Bombay           | 1 4 8                 | Exptian 15 Lady Raffice                  |      | John FenwickSmall, Colquhoun, & Co.William Willis                                                                                                                                      | Wm. Lilburn                                                                                                                        | W. I. Dockslty Canal.                 | 469 301 Ohn Perwitk                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                            |
| Meurithus & Cey- |                       | 5 Ceylon10 Dunegan Castle            |      | 253 John Bently 253 John Bently 254 G. Robinson and Finlay                                                                                                                                     | Francis Davison W. I. Docks John Lyney, Jun. Thomas Fmlay City Canal. E. Robinson, & B. W. J. Josephy W. I. Docks Thes. Surflen. & | W. I. Dockslity Canal                 | 253 John Benty.  253 John Benty.  254 John Benty.  17 John Shrings Davison. W. I. Docks John Lyney, Jun.  255 John Benty.  257 John Benty.  258 John Benty.  25 |
|                  | MayMarch 2        | May 1 HistorianMarch 29 Clorinda     |      | 400 William Tindall John Rowland 180 Inglis, Forbes, and Co George Carrew                                                                                                                      | John Rowland                                                                                                                       | W. I. DocksLon. Docks                 | 400 William Tindall John Rowland W. I. Docks John Lyney, jun. 190 Inglis, Forbes, and Co George Carrew Lon. Docks E. and A. Rule, Lime-street.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                 |
| Bataria & Singa- | I Amil 1              | 1 Norna10 StlenceAmil 15 Flina   |      | 309 John George Leggett J. Geo. Leggett W. I. Docks E. Read, and W. Ke2411 Thomas Weeding F. Jackson Lon. Docks Wm. Redhead, jun.220 R. Flinn E. Phillipson Lon. Docks Tomiln and Man. | J. Geo. LeggettF. JacksonE. Philipson                                                                                      | W. I. DocksLon. DocksLon. Docks   | E. Read, and W. Rednead, jun.Wm. Redhead, jun.Tomlin and Man.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                          |
| New South Wales  | March                 | 7 Caroline10 Henry Wellesiey         |      | 300 Robert Brooks320 John Marshall                                                                                                                                                         | J. W. Howey J. F. Church                                                                                                           | Lon. DocksLon. Docks                  | 300 Robert Brooks J. W. Howey Lon. Docks Robert Brooks, Old Broad-street, 330 John Marshall, Birchin-lane. 280-John Marshall, Birchin-lane. 30 John Marshall, Birchin-lane. 30 John Marshall, Birchin-lane. 300 Lawis John Marshall, Birchin-lane.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                             |
| V. D. Land & N.  |                       | 7 Aluce10 Arab20 Wave            |      | 214 William Martin and Co. Geo. K. Todd220 John Binmer                                                                                                                                     | Geo. K. Todd ···· Lon. DocksJames Ferrier ···· Lon. DocksWm, Hide ····· Lon. Docks                                         | Lon. DocksLon. DocksLon. Docks    | W. Martin and Co., E. I. ChambersJ. Binmer, Church-row, FenchurcBuckles and Co.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                        |
|                  | April                 | 5 Teresa Mary                            |      | 420 Johna Jones Joseph BeckettLon. Docks220 John George Hartley J. G. HartleyLon. Docks                                                                                                    | Joseph Beckett J. G. Hartley                                                                                                       | Lon. DocksLon. Docks                  | 420 Johns Jones Joseph BeckettLon Docks, Edw. and Arthur Rule, Lime-street 220 John George Hartley                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                             |
|                  |                       | -                                        |      |                                                                                                                                                                                                |                                                                                                                                    |                                           | 29th Feb. 1828.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                |

EAST-INDIA COMPANY'S SHIPS, of the Season 1827-8, with their Managing Owners, Commanders, &c.

| To sailto To sailto To bi In the In the                          | 20 8 Pet.                                      | *                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     | *                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                  |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                   | ,                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                              | •                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                              | :           | . 3                                     |
|------------------------------------------------------------------|------------------------------------------------|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-------------|-----------------------------------------|
| To be in the same.                                               | 82 ga                                          |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                             | 21 do.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                | 'Mar.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                             | il do.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         | 9May                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                           |             | ,                                       |
| 10 sailtoGraves-end.                                     | 1827.                                          | 1828.1Jan.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                              | 16 do.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                   | 5 Feb. 25 Mar 2                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                            | 4.4pr. 1                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       |             | , , , , , , , , , , , , , , , , , , , , |
| To be                                                            | 1827. 1827. 1828.                              | 3Dec. 18 de. 23 do.1828.18 de. 1Jan. GFeb                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                           | 1828.  1Jan. 16do.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                | 16 do. 31 do. 7 Mar.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                              | 1Feb. 15Feb. 21 do.1Mar. 15Mar 20Apr.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                      | 30 do. 14.2pr. 19May29.4pr. 13.May 18.7um                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                  |             | ,                                       |
| Consignments.                                                    | 200                                            | Bengal & China Bengal & China Bengal & China                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                | Bombay & China Bengal & China                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         | St. Helena, Bom-bay, & ChinaMadras & China                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                | Mauritius & China.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                             | Madras & Bengal                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                |             |                                         |
| Pursera                                                          | J. GliesW.J.ShepherdJ. H. Lanyon       | W. MaltmanT. A. GibbJohn LenoxJ. W. RoseW. Spawforth                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                        | Wm. DallasWm. Ainslie                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                             | T.CollingwoodJ.Walki hawPeter Milne                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       | John MainH. BeveridgeR. Dudgeon                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                        | R. Greig                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       | W. L. Irwin |                                         |
| Surgeons.                                                        | Francis BurlinRobt. HarveyJohn Millard | Jas. BeveridgeDavid ScottAlex. StirlingT. DavidsonJas. Grant                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                | W. HitchcockHenry ArnotE. Turner                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                              | Thos. Cron Alex. Macrae Geo. Comb                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                 | J. CampbellF. KiernanDavid Forest                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                      | R. Greig Alex. Crowe. John Milroy. Wm. Scott Honey Millet                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                      | R. Achwick  |                                         |
| First Officers. Second Officers. Third Officers. FourthOfficers. | J. K. JollyA. TomlinsThos. N. Were     | R. Saunders. P. J. Maxwell A. Macqueen H. Dalrymple C. Udale                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                | W. PitcaimE. Dupuis                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               | John WillieChas. RayJ. H. Thorn                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                           | R. Howard J. G. F. Pigott Jas. Jameson                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         | F. Shaw                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                        |             | ,                                       |
| Third Officers.                                                  | R. BuckleGeo. WallerJas. M. Baird      | D. RobertsonJohn RoseA PCostobadieJ.W.EdmondsSamuel HydeGeo. Steward                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                    | H. ShepherdBoulter J. BellWm. Pigott.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         | H. J. Wolfe John Pitcaim R. Burroughes H. W. Parker                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               | J. DalrympleG. CreightonO. Richardson                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                  | G. M. AbbottChas. WhiteM. Murray                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       |             |                                         |
| Second Officers.                                                 | James RickettD. MarshallHenry Burn     | J. Elphinstone D. J. Ward R. Tabor T. Shepherd CW Loveridge Thos. Sandys                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                    | Geo.FramptonJ. P. GriffithsF. G. Moore                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                        | John FennF. MacQueenT.W. MarriottBeni, Bailey                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         | Henry Wise A. Broadhurst W.K.Packman R. M. Isacke                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                              | Henry HarrisJ. A. SenhouseJ. Miller                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                    |             |                                         |
| First Officers.                                                  | John ShuteT.ButtanshawG. Braithwaite   | W. Drayner W. Ticehurst Thos. Leach H. L. Thomas Edw. Jacob T. J. Dyer                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                      | Jas. S. BilesRees ThomasWm. Pulham                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                            | W. Haylett James Sexton Geo. Deudney N. de St. Crox                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               | G. C. KennedyT. B. PenfoldA. Rivers                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                    | R.H.TrehemeWm. MarqueW.H.HopkinsH.M.Sterndale                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                      |             |                                         |
| Commanders.                                                      | 1325 G. Palmer                                 | 3.8. Majoribunia Alex Chrystle. W. Drayner. J. Ephinistone D. Robertson, R. Sander. J. St. Beveridge W. Maltman. 182 Joseph Hare. J. O. M. Taggart. W. Tichburg. B. J. March. 19. March. | 1330 H. Bonham John Innes Jas. S. Biles Geo-Frampton H. Shepherd W. Pitzinn W. Hitchock Wm. Dallas 1417 Companys Sup. Broughton Rese Thomas J. P. Griffith Brougher J. Rell. 2. Duptis Herry Anno. Wm. Annie 1380 Companys Sup. Phose W. Barrow, Wm. Pulhan F. G. Moore Wm. Pigott Herry Smith B. Turner J. W. Graham | T. Larkins James Walker. Thomas Blair Charles Steward                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                             | Thomas DunkinPhilip BaylisTunothy SmithW. E. Farrer                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                | Henry Hosmer Thos. Marquis C. E. Mangles T. F. Balderston                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                      |             |                                         |
| ManagingOconers.                                             | 1325 G. Palmer1325 H. Bonham               | S. MarjoribanksJoseph HareJ. Mac TaggartS. MarjoribanksJohn F. TiminsW. E. Ferrers                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                      | H. BonhamCompany's ShipCompany's Ship                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         | W. C. Drysdale John Campbell Joseph Hare H. Blanshard                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                             | J. H. GledstanesCompany's ShipCompany's ShipMatthew Isacke                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         | H. Bonham Thos. Milroy O. Wigram H. Bonham                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     |             | ,                                       |
| Tons.                                                            | 85 88 88 8                                     | 322333                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                      | 11330                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                 | 13 25 2513 25 2513 25 2513 251313 2513 2515151515151515151515151515 | 28882888                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                   | 85338433                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                   |             |                                         |
| Shipe.                                                           | 6 Dunisa2 Eduburgh8 General Harris     | 6 Thomas Courte                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                             | { Abercrombie   Robinson   Earl of Balearras George the Fourth                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                        | 8 Marquis Canden 1231 W. C. Drysdale T. Larkins W. Haylett John Fenn H. J. Wolfe John Willie Thos. Cron T. Collingwood Macqueen                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                   | Cante Hardy 1311 J. H. Gledstener Thomas Dunkin G. C. Remody Henry Wes. J. Dirtymphe B. H. Mazatlevi (Not. Mathu C. S. Compton) 6 Canning. 1326 Company, 8349 Philip Baylis. T. B. Penfold, M. Broadhust G. Creighbe J. Glowad et J. Campbell - John Main - ill. Bayeridge J. Lador, C. Creighbe J. Chenger, P. Kennan et B. Beveridge J. Chadwa. C. Creighbe C. C. F. Egorffe Neman et B. Beveridge J. Chadwa. 1326 Matthew lacke W. E. Farrer - Jas. Wison - M. M. Isacken O. Richterson (Javid Forest R. Dadigeon-Gorell P. Petrole C. Creighbe C. M. M. Isacken J. P. Piddine Che. Lancon (Javid Forest R. Dadigeon-Gorell P. Piddine Che. Lancon (Javid Forest R. Dadigeon-Gorell P. Piddine Che. Lancon (Javid Forest R. Dadigeon-Gorell P. Piddine Che. Lancon (Javid Forest R. Dadigeon-Che. Lancon (Javid Forest R. Dadie) (Javid Forest R. Dadigeon-Che. Lancon (Javid Forest R. Dadie) (Jav | 9 Parote Regent v. 1: 86H Bonham Henry Harris Homen R.H. Trehemelleny Harris G. M. Abbott F. Shawmone P. Rosen 1: 1094 Thos. Miltoy Thos. Marquis. Wm. Marquis, J. A. Senbuse Chas. White. P. Shawmone of English S. Sol. O. Wilton C. E. Mangles. W. H. Hopking.  9 Marchiones of Engl. Sol. O. Wignam C. E. Mangles. W. H. Hopking.  9 Anna W. Marris W. |             |                                         |
| Nonge.                                                           | 60 00                                          | 0404-4                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                      | 01 F-01                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               | 0,440                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                             | ထတတထ                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                           | 0000                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                           |             |                                         |

|                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                |                                                                                                                   | PR                                                                 | ICE C                                                                                      | URRE                                                                                                 | NT, Feb                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       | . 26.                                                                                                                                                                                                         | _                                                                  |                                                                                                                                                                            |                                                                                                                                                    |
|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|--------------------------------------------------------------------|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|--------------------------------------------------------------------|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| BA:                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                            | st-india                                                                                                          | PRODU                                                              | CE.                                                                                        |                                                                                                      | Indigo, BluePurple                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                        |                                                                                                                                                                                                               | s. B                                                               | s. d.                                                                                                                                                                      | £. s. s.                                                                                                                                           |
| Coffee, Tava                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                   |                                                                                                                   | £. s.                                                              | d. £                                                                                       | 4                                                                                                    | Ехіта і                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       | and Violetine Violet                                                                                                                                                                                      | 0                                                                  | 99-                                                                                                                                                                        | 0 10 9                                                                                                                                             |
| Coffee, JavaCheribonSumatra                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                            |                                                                                                                   | 1 13                                                               | 0 - 1                                                                                      | 18 013 0                                                                                         | Violet                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                        | and Coppe                                                                                                                                                                                                     | ···· 0                                                             | 7 0 -                                                                                                                                                                      | 0 9 0                                                                                                                                              |
| - Bourdon .                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                    |                                                                                                                   | 3 0                                                                | -                                                                                          | -                                                                                                    | - Fine C                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                      | opper · · ·                                                                                                                                                                                                   | 0                                                                  | 56-                                                                                                                                                                        | 070                                                                                                                                                |
| Cotton. Surat                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                  |                                                                                                                   | 10 0 0                                                      | 0 - 54 - 64 - 6                                                                    | 0 00 50 5                                                                                    | Consur                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                        | ning sortsood and find bad Oude                                                                                                                                                                       | ···· 0                                                             | 50                                                                                                                                                                         | 0 6 0                                                                                                                                              |
| - Bengal                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       |                                                                                                                   | 0 0                                                                | 4 = 6                                                                                      | 0 5                                                                                                  |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               |                                                                                                                                                                                                               |                                                                    | 9 0 -                                                                                                                                                                      | 9 5 00 8 3                                                                                                                                     |
| Drugs & for Dy                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                 | eing.                                                                                                             |                                                                    |                                                                                            |                                                                                                      | — Do. mRice, Benga                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                        | id. ord. andl White                                                                                                                                                                                       | bad 0                                                              | 3 é =                                                                                                                                                                      | 0 6 6                                                                                                                                              |
| Aloes, EpaticsAnnisceds, Sta                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               | r                                                                                                                 |                                                                    |                                                                                            |                                                                                                      | Patna -                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       |                                                                                                                                                                                                               | 0                                                                  | 18 0 -                                                                                                                                                                     | 1 1 0                                                                                                                                              |
| Borax, Refine                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                  | di, or Tine                                                                                                       | 9 9cal 2 0                                                     | 0 - 2                                                                                      | 5 0                                                                                                  | Safflower · · ·Sago · · · · · ·Saltpetre · · ·                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                        |                                                                                                                                                                                                               |                                                                    | 15 0 -                                                                                                                                                                     | · 1 10 0                                                                                                                                           |
| Camphire                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       | Malaber                                                                                                           | tb 0 15                                                            | 0 - 8                                                                                      | 16 0                                                                                                 | Silk. Benga                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                   | Skein                                                                                                                                                                                                         | · · · ID                                                           |                                                                                                                                                                            |                                                                                                                                                    |
| Cassia Buds                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                    |                                                                                                                   | 0 1                                                                | $0 - 0 \\ 0 - 5$                                                                           | 1 6                                                                                                  | Novi . Ditto V                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                | Vhite · · · ·                                                                                                                                                                                                 | 0                                                                  | 14 11 —15 9 —                                                                                                                                                          | 1 1 11                                                                                                                                             |
| Castor Oll                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     | ••••••                                                                                                            | 4 10                                                               | 6 - 5                                                                                      | 0 0                                                                                                  | —— ChinaSpices, Cinn—— Cloves                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         | amon                                                                                                                                                                                                          |                                                                    | 18 4 -                                                                                                                                                                     | · 1 3 5· 0 19 8· 0 6 9                                                                                                                     |
| Dragon's BlooGun Ammoni                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                    | $\mathbf{d} \cdot \cdots \cdot \mathbf{c}$                                                                        | Wt. 50                                                             | 0 - 20                                                                                     | 0 0                                                                                                  | Cloves                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                        |                                                                                                                                                                                                               | 0                                                                  | 0 10 -                                                                                                                                                                     | · 026                                                                                                                                              |
| Arabic ·                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       |                                                                                                                   |                                                                    | 0 - 30 - 3                                                                             | 10 0 °                                                                                               | Nutme                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         | gs                                                                                                                                                                                                            | : 0                                                                | 2 6 -15 0 -                                                                                                                                                            | $\begin{array}{cccccccccccccccccccccccccccccccccccc$                                                                                               |
| Benjamir                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       | 1                                                                                                                 | 2 0                                                                | 0 - 50                                                                                     | 0 0                                                                                                  | Pepper                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                        | , Black                                                                                                                                                                                                       | b 0                                                                | 0 3 -                                                                                                                                                                      | 0 5 30 3 31 2 00 0 40 1 4                                                                                                          |
| Animi Gambogi                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                  | ıım                                                                                                               | . 26 0                                                             | 0 - 27                                                                                     | 0 0                                                                                                  | Sugar, Beng— Siam a— Maurit                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                           | gal                                                                                                                                                                                                           | cwt. 1                                                             | 10 0 -                                                                                                                                                                     | - 1 17 0                                                                                                                                           |
| Olibanun                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       | 1 · · · · · · ·                                                                                                   | 2 10                                                               | 0 - 5                                                                                      |                                                                                                      | Maurit                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                        | ius                                                                                                                                                                                                           | î                                                                  | 5 0 -                                                                                                                                                                      | - 1 18 0                                                                                                                                           |
| KinoLac Lake                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               |                                                                                                                   | th 0 1                                                             | $0 - 14 \\ 0 - 0$                                                                          |                                                                                                      | Congor                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                        | 1                                                                                                                                                                                                             | 0                                                                  | 2 1 -                                                                                                                                                                      | 0 2 0                                                                                                                                              |
| DyeShell                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                   |                                                                                                                   | 0 3                                                                | 9 - 4                                                                                      | 5 0                                                                                                  | Campo                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         | ong                                                                                                                                                                                                           | ()                                                                 | 2 11 -                                                                                                                                                                     | - 0 4 8- 0 3 3                                                                                                                                 |
| Stick · · ·                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                    | • • • • • • • •                                                                                                   | 3 ()                                                               | 0 - 1                                                                                      |                                                                                                      | Pekne                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         | ay                                                                                                                                                                                                            | 0                                                                  | 2 3 -                                                                                                                                                                      |                                                                                                                                                    |
| Oil, Cassia                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                    |                                                                                                                   | 0 0                                                                | 5                                                                                          | 10 0                                                                                                 | Hyson                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         | Skin · · · ·                                                                                                                                                                                                  | 0                                                                  | 2 4 -                                                                                                                                                                      | - 0 3 10- 0 6 1                                                                                                                                |
| Cloves -                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       |                                                                                                                   | tb 0 1                                                             | 0 - (3 - (2 - (                                                                    | i 6                                                                                                  | Young                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         | Hyson · · ·                                                                                                                                                                                                   | ()                                                                 | 3 4 -                                                                                                                                                                      | - 0 6 1- 0 3 8- 0 5 2                                                                                                                      |
| Nutmegs                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                        |                                                                                                                   | 02                                                                 | 5 = 6                                                                                      | 3 0                                                                                                  | TortoisesheWood, San                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                      | dors Red                                                                                                                                                                                                      | 1                                                                  | 4 0 -                                                                                                                                                                      | - 2 10 0- 10 0 0                                                                                                                               |
| Opium · · · · · · Rhubarb · · · ·                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                              |                                                                                                                   | 0 1                                                                | 6 - 6                                                                                      | 5 6                                                                                                  |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               | AUSTRALI                                                                                                                                                                                                      |                                                                    | •                                                                                                                                                                          | - 10 0 0                                                                                                                                           |
| Sal AmmoniaeSenna                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                          |                                                                                                                   | ∙th 0 0                                                            | 9 - 6                                                                                      | 196                                                                                                  | Oil, Southe                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                   | m                                                                                                                                                                                                             | · tun 30                                                           | 0 0                                                                                                                                                                        |                                                                                                                                                    |
| Turmeric, Ja Bengal China                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                      | Va C                                                                                                              | wt. 1 101 10                                                   | 0 - 1                                                                                      | 14 012 0                                                                                         | Head 1                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                        |                                                                                                                                                                                                               | 86                                                                 | 0 0                                                                                                                                                                        |                                                                                                                                                    |
| Galls, in Sorts                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                |                                                                                                                   | 35                                                                 | 0 - 3                                                                                      | 2 2 03 10 0                                                                                      | Wood, Blu                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     | e Gum · · ·                                                                                                                                                                                                   | · · · ton 0                                                        | 6 0 -                                                                                                                                                                      | - 0'5 0- 0 7 0- 0 0 6                                                                                                                      |
| , Blue · · ·                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                   | · · · · · · · · · · ·                                                                                             | 3 10                                                               | 0                                                                                          | 3 15 0                                                                                               | Cedar                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         |                                                                                                                                                                                                               | 0                                                                  | 0 5 -                                                                                                                                                                      | - 0 0 6                                                                                                                                            |
| DAII                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                           | LYPR                                                                                                              | ICES                                                               |                                                                                            |                                                                                               | from 26                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       | January                                                                                                                                                                                                       | to 25 F                                                            | ebruary                                                                                                                                                                    |                                                                                                                                                    |
| Jan. BankStock.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                            | 3 Pr. Ct.Red.                                                                                                 | 3 Pr. Ct.Consols.                                              | 3] Pr.Ct.Consols.                                                                      | 3] Pr.Ct.Red.                                                                                    | N. 4Pr.C.Ann.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                             | LongAnnuities.                                                                                                                                                                                            | IndiaStock.                                                    | IndiaBonds.                                                                                                                                                            | Exch.Bills.                                                                                                                                    |
| 26 -                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                           | 861865                                                                                                            | 821821                                                             | 933                                                                                        | 931931                                                                                               | 100 101 8                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     | 19#                                                                                                                                                                                                           | 2493                                                               | 91 92p                                                                                                                                                                     | 60 61p                                                                                                                                             |
| 28 093101                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                      |                                                                                                                   | 85 85 8                                                            | -                                                                                          | 93 8 93 3                                                                                            | 101 है 101 है                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                 |                                                                                                                                                                                                               |                                                                    | 91 93p                                                                                                                                                                     | 60 61p                                                                                                                                             |
| 30 -                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                           | -                                                                                                                 | -                                                                  | -                                                                                          | _                                                                                                    | _                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                             | _                                                                                                                                                                                                             | _                                                                  |                                                                                                                                                                            |                                                                                                                                                    |
| 31 209}                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                        | 861861                                                                                                            | 85 \ 85 \ 3                                                        | 931                                                                                        | 93193                                                                                                | 1011                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                          | 191 194                                                                                                                                                                                                       |                                                                    | 91 93p                                                                                                                                                                     | 61 62p                                                                                                                                             |
| Feb.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                           |                                                                                                                   | ~ -                                                                | _                                                                                          |                                                                                                      |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               | ا آ                                                                                                                                                                                                           |                                                                    |                                                                                                                                                                            | 1 1                                                                                                                                                |
| 1 208393                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       | 861861                                                                                                            | 851853                                                             | 93                                                                                         | 931931                                                                                               |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               |                                                                                                                                                                                                               |                                                                    |                                                                                                                                                                            | 100 00-1                                                                                                                                           |
| 19                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                             | l —                                                                                                               | _ `                                                                |                                                                                            |                                                                                                      | 10081018                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                      | 19] 19]                                                                                                                                                                                                       | 249                                                                | 93p                                                                                                                                                                        | 61 62p                                                                                                                                             |
| 2 -                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                            | 85186                                                                                                             | l —                                                                | _                                                                                          | 92193                                                                                                |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               | - "                                                                                                                                                                                                           | 249                                                                |                                                                                                                                                                            | 61 68p                                                                                                                                             |
| 2 -4 2081915 208191                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                    | 86 861                                                                                                            | 85 185 1 85 1                             | 931                                                                                        | 92393                                                                                                | 1001100110011001                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                          | 19‡ 19‡197, 19‡                                                                                                                                                                                       | =                                                                  | 91 93p93 94p                                                                                                                                                           | 61 68p61 62p                                                                                                                                   |
| 2 -4 2081915 2081916 207181                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                        | 86 86186 861                                                                                                  | 85 185 1 85 185 1 85 1  | 931                                                                                        | 923933933                                                                                        | 100 100 1100 100 1100 100 7                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                           | 19# 19#197 19#19% 19%                                                                                                                                                                                 |                                                                    | 91 93p93 94p94 95p                                                                                                                                                 | 61 68p61 62p63 64p                                                                                                                         |
| 24 2081915 2081916 2071817                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     | 86 86186 861851857                                                                                        | 851851851851851841851                      | 93193193192193                                                                 | 923933933923923                                                                              | 10011003100110071001100710011007                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                  | 19# 19#197 19#19# 19%19# 19%                                                                                                                                                                      | 249249                                                         | 91 93p93 94p94 95p94p                                                                                                                                          | 61 68p61 62p63 64p61 68p61 69p                                                                                                     |
| 2 2081915 2081916 2071817                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                          | 86 86186 86185185186 86186 861                                                                    | 851851851851851851851851851        | 9319319319239392393                                                        | 923933933923923923923934938                                                      | 100110031001100310031003100310031003101                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       | 19# 19#197 19#19% 19%19# 19%19# 19#19# 19#                                                                                                                                                | 249249249249                                           | 91 93p93 94p94 95p94p92 93p                                                                                                                                | 61 68p61 62p63 64p61 63p61 62p60 63p                                                                                           |
| 2 2081915 2081916 2071817 8 2071819 2081                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       | 86 86186 86185185186 86186 861                                                                    | 851851851851851851851851851851 | 93193193192193931931                                                       | 923933933923923934938928923                                                      | 100 1 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 100 3 |                                                                                                                                                                                                               | 249249249249250                                    | 91 93p93 94p94 95p94p92 93p                                                                                                                                | 61 68p61 62p63 64p61 63p61 62p60 63p60 62p                                                                                 |
| 2 2081915 2081916 2071817 8 2071819 208111 20819                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                           | 86 8686 8685385386 8686 86863863                                                              | 851851851851851851851851851851 | 931931931921921931931931931                                | 921931931921921931931921921931931                                            | 100110031003100310031003100310031003101100310110131013                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                            | 19# 19#197, 19#19% 19%19# 19#19# 19#19# 19#19# 19#19# 19#                                                                                                                         | 249249249249250                                    | 91 93p93 94p94 95p94p92 93p93p92p93 94p                                                                                                        | 61 68p61 62p63 64p61 63p61 62p60 63p60 62p60 62p61 62p                                                             |
| 2 2081915 2081916 2071817 8 2071819 2081                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       | 86 8686 868538586 8686 86863868638686386                                              | 851851851851851851851851851851 | 93 k93 k92 k92 k93 k93 k93 k93 k93 k93 k               | 921931931921921931931931931931931931931931                           | 100110031003100310031003100310031003101100310110141014                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                            | 19# 19½ 197, 19½ 19½ 19½ 19½ 19½ 19½ 19½ 19½ 19½ 19½ 19¾ 19½ 19¾ 19½ 19¾ 19½ 19¾                                                                                                                              | 249249249249250                                    | 91 93p93 94p94 95p94p92 93p93p92p93 94p93 94p                                                                                              | 61 68p61 62p63 64p61 63p61 62p60 63p60 62p60 62p61 62p61 62p                                                   |
| 2 2081915 2081916 2071817 2071819 208111 208112 208114 208115 2081                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                             | 86 8686 8685 8686 86 | 851851851851851851851851851851 | 93193193192393931931931931931                              | 927938938927927938938928925938938938938938938                        | 100½100¾ 100½100¾ 100½100¾ 100½101⅓ 100¾101⅓ 101¼101⅓ 101¼101¾ 101¼101¾ 101¼101¾                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                              | 19# 19# 19# 19# 19# 19# 19# 19# 19# 19#                                                                                                                                                                       | 249249249250249 50                                 | 91 93p93 94p94 95p94 95p92 93p93 94p93 94p93 94p93 94p                                                                                     | 61 68p61 62p63 64p61 63p61 62p60 63p60 62p60 62p61 62p61 62p60 62p                                         |
| 2 2081915 2081916 2071817                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                          | 86 86 86 86 86 86 86 86 86 86 86 86 86 8                                                                          | 851851851851851851851851851851 | 93½93½92¾9393½93¾93½93½93½                                         | 921931931921921931931921921931931931931931931931931              | 100110031003100310031003100310031003101310131013                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                          | 19# 19# 19# 19# 19# 19# 19# 19# 19# 19#                                                                                                                                                                       | 249249249250249250249250               | 91 93p93 94p94 95p94 95p92 93p92 93p93 94p93 94p93 94p93 94p                                                                           | 61 68p61 62p63 64p61 63p61 63p60 63p60 62p60 62p61 62p60 62p60 63p60 63p                               |
| 2 2081915 2081916 2071817 2071819 208111 208112 208114 208115 2081                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                             | 86 86 85 86 85 86 86 86 86 86 86  86 86  86 86  86 86 86 86 86                | 851851851851851851851851851851 | 93½93½92¾9392¾93¾93½93½93½93½                                  | 92 (93 ) 93 (92 (93 ) 93 (93 ) 93 (93 ) 93 (93 ) 93 (93 ) 93 (93 ) 93 (93 )                          | 100½100¾ 100½100¾ 100½100¾ 100½101⅓ 100¾101⅓ 101¼101⅓ 101¼101¾ 101¼101¾ 101¼101¾                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                              | 19                                                                                                                                                                                                            | 249249249250249250249250               | 91 93p93 94p94 95p94 95p92 93p92 93p93 94p93 94p93 94p93 94p                                                                           | 61 68p61 62p63 64p61 63p60 63p60 62p60 62p61 62p60 62p60 62p60 62p60 63p                               |
| 2 2084945 2084946 2074847 208499 208411 2084913 208414 2084915 208416 208419 208419 20842084208420842084208420842084                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                   | 86 86 86 86 85  85  85 86 86 86  86  86 86  86  86 86 86  86                              | 85\\\ 85\\\\ 85\\\\\ 85\\\\\\\\\\\\\\\\                            | 93 k93 k92 k92 k92 k93 k93 k93 k93 k93 k93 k       | 92 (93)92 (93)92 (92)93)93)93)93)93)93)93)93)93)93   | 100 1100 2100 1100 2100 1100 2100 1100 2100 1100 2100 110 1101 110 1                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       | 19# 19#197 19#19# 19# | 249249249250249250249250               | 91 93p93 94p94 95p94 95p92 93p92 9393 94p93 94p93 94p93 95p                                                                            | 61 68p61 62p63 64p61 63p60 63p60 62p60 62p61 62p60 62p60 64p60 65p60 68p                               |
| 2 2084945 2084946 2074847                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                          | 86 8686 8685 8986 8686 8686 8686 8686 8686 8686 8686 8686 8686 86 | 851851851851851851851851851851 | 93 1 93 1 92 1 93 1 93 1 93 1 93 1 93 1                                                    | 924934924924934934938924938934938934934934934934934934934934 | 10031003100310031003100310031003100310110031011013101101310110131011013101101310110131011013101101310110131011013101                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                              | 19 19 19 19 19 19 19 19 19 19 19 19 19 1                                                                                                                                                                      | 249249249250249250249250249249 | 91 93p93 94p94 95p92 93p92 93p93 94p93 94p93 94p93 9494 95p                                                                            | 61 65p61 62p63 64p61 63p61 63p60 62p60 62p60 62p60 62p60 65p60 65p60 65p60 65p60 65p60 65p |
| 2 2 - 208494 5 208494 6 207484 7 - 20849 11 2 20849 13 2084 14 20849 15 2084 16 20849 20849 20 - 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 2084 9 208 | 86 86 86 86 86 86 86 86 86 86 86 86 86 8                                                                          | 851851851851851851851851851851 | 93 k93 k92 k92 k93 k93 k93 k93 k93 k93 k93 k93 | 924934924924934934938924938934938934934934934934934934934934 | 10031003100310031003100310031003100310110031011013101101310110131011013101101310110131011013101101310110131011013101                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                              | 19 19 19 19 19 19 19 19 19 19 19 19 19 1                                                                                                                                                                      | 249249249250249250249250249249 | 91 93p93 94p94 95p94 95p92 93p92 93p93 94p93 94p93 94p93 9494 95p95 94p96 95p97 98 98 98 98 98 98 98 98 98 98 98 98 98 | 61 63p63 64p61 63p61 63p60 63p60 62p60 62p61 62p60 62p60 65p60 65p60 65p60 65p60 65p           |
| 2                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                              | 86 86 86 86 86 86 86 86 86 86 86 86 86 8                                                                          | 851851851851851851851851851851 | 93                                                                                         | 92 193 1 93 1 93 1 93 1 93 1 93 1 93 1 9                                                             | 100 1100 2100 1100 2100 1100 2100 1100 2100 1100 2100 110 1101 110 1                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       | 19# 19# 19# 19# 19# 19# 19# 19# 19# 19#                                                                                                                                                                       | 249249249250249250249250249249 | 91 93p93 94p94 95p92 93p93p93 94p93 94p93 94p93 94p94 95p95 94p94 95p                                                          | 61 68p61 62p63 64p63 64p61 63p60 62p60 62p60 62p60 62p60 63p60 63p60 63p60 63p60 63p60 63p |

THE ## ASIATIC JOURNAL

FOR

APRIL, 1828.

Original Communications,

8c. 8c. 8c.

THE HINDU DRAMA.

We have already given an analysis of the first piece in Mr. Wilson's collection of Sanscrit plays, namely the Mrichchakati, in a former volume.* The editor assigns satisfactory reasons for considering this piece a very ancient production: it was certainly written earlier than the tenth century, and probably about the second; some ascribe to it a still more remote date. The internal evidence contained in the play, the style of which is of a period antecedent to that when elaborate richness and other tokens of decay were perceptible in Sanscrit composition, about the ninth and tenth centuries, comes in aid of other proofs. One of these, the indication of the prosperous condition of the Bauddha faith, was mentioned in the article to which we have referred. Mr. Wilson justly lays much stress upon this proof:

At what period could this diffusion and prosperity of the Bauddha faith have occurred, and when was it likely that a popular work should describe it correctly? Many centuries have elapsed since Hindu writers were acquainted with the Bauddhas in their genuine character; their tenets are preserved in philosophical treatises with something kke accuracy, but any attempt to describe their persons and practices invariably confounds them with the Jainas—the Michokadat is as yet the only work where the Bauddhas appear undisguised. Now we know from the Christian writers of the second century, that in their days the worship of Butta or Buddha was very prevalent in India. We have every reason to believe that shortly after that time the religion began to decline, more in consequence of the rise and growth of the Jains probably, than any persecution of the Bauddhas, and as it is clear that the Drama was written in the days of their prosperity, it follows that we cannot fairly assign it a later date than the first centuries of the Christian era.

We merely add that the Mrichchakati excites considerable interest, and the characters are various, well discriminated, and well preserved. "The interest is rarely suspended, and in every case the apparent interruption is, with great ingenuity, made subservient to the common design: the connexion of the two plots is much better maintained than in the play we usually refer to as a happy specimen of such a combination,-the Spanish Friar."

Vikrama and Urvasi, the second piece in the collection, which is attributed to Kálidása, the author of Sakuntalá, is a specimen of the Uparúpaka class of dramas,* denominated Trotaka, the business of which is partly human, partly celestial. The dramatis persona accordingly include Apsarasas (heavenly nymphs), and other inhabitants of the Swerga or paradise of Indra. The story is to be found variously related in different Puranas. The Matsua Purana tells it more agreeably to the tenour of the drama; and the editor is of opinion that the tale in that work is either derived from a common source with the dramatic plot, or, which is not improbable, that it has borrowed from the latter its general complexion.

The play opens with a prelude, which, as it is short, we shall insert: it will illustrate the description of the inductions to these dramas which has been already given:

Enter the Manager.

May that Siva protect you who is attainable by devotion and faith; who is the sole male of the Vedánta, spread through all space, to whom alone the name of Lord is applicable, and who is sought with suppressed breath by those who covet final emancipation!

Man. (Looking off the stage.) Ho, Marisha, come hither.

Enter Actor.

Act. Here am I, Sir. Man. Many assemblies have witnessed the compositions of former dramatic Bards. I therefore propose to exhibit one not hitherto represented, the drama of Vikrama and Urvasí. Desire the company to be ready to do justice to their respective parts.

Act. I shall, Sir.

Man. I have now only to request the audience that they will listen to this work of Kálidása with attention and kindness, in consideration of its subject and respect for the author.

> (Behind the Scenes.) Help, help, if, in the middle sky, A friend be found-to aid us fly.

Man. What sounds are these in the air, that like the plaintive bleat of lambs, break in upon my speech? was it the murmur of the bee or Koil's distant song, or do the Nymphs of heaven, as they pass above, warble their celestial strains? - Ah no-it is the cry of distress. The fair creation of the saint, the friend of NARA, URVASI, has been carried off by a demon on her return from the halls of the Sovereign of Kailasa, and her sisters are invoking some friendly power to their aid.

The piece then opens with a chorus of Apsarasas in the air, over the peaks of the Himalaya, who appear in distress, being pursued by the demon or daitya, Késí. Purúravas, king of Pratishtána + (descended by both parents from Brahmá), comes to their aid, and rescues the beauteous Urvasí from the demon's power. The dialogue has many passages of great beauty here. Whilst the king surveys the form of Urvasi, who had fainted, the following remark from him reminds us of Shakspeare:

> The scarf that veils her bosom Hides not its flutterings, and the panting breast Seems as it felt the wreath of heavenly blossoms Weigh too oppressively.

The heroic act of Pururavas is rewarded by the thanks of Indra, communicated municated by Chitraratha, king of the Gandharbas (male choristers of heaven), who invites him to Swerga, and declares that the nymph he had rescued was to be his boon. Pururavas modestly declines this meed, alleging that "other claims demand his distant presence." The celestial party thereupon reascend to Indra's court, not, however, till Pururavas and Urvasí had discovered evident tokens of a mutual passion.

At a subsequent interview, in the garden of the king's palace, the amorous pair disclose their reciprocal love. The king is accompanied on this occasion by the Vidúshaka,* named Mánava, a loquacious companion and confidant of the king, who had, in a preceding scene, unwittingly disclosed his master's passion for Urvasi to an artful, inquisitive attendant upon Ausinari, the queen of Pururavas, daughter of the king of Benares, who had become igalous on account of her husband's melancholy. Urvasi had written on a leaf some verses expressive of her love for the king, which she threw in the Vidúshaka's way previous to becoming visible (for Urvasí and her celestial companion are at first invisible to mortals, "concealed in veiled mist," in order to overhear the conversation of the king and his confidant); this leaf the king desired the Vidúshaka to take care of. He, however, loses it, and it finds its way, as might be expected, into the hands of the queen, who behaves as ladies usually do on these occasions: she upbraids her lord, talks of her wrongs, spurns the prostrate king, and, as Manava expresses it, "goes off in a hurry like a river in the rains."

We are acquainted in the next act (the third), by the conversation of two disciples of the sage Bharata (no very artificial mode of helping the action), that Urvasí has been banished from the court of Indra, and permitted to pass her term of exile with king Purúravas: the cause of this punishment was her forgetting her part in a drama performed before the immortals, wherein, as Lakshmi, she upon being asked "to whom inclines your heart?" replied "to Purúravas," instead of "Purushottama," i. e. Crishna.

In the next scene, accordingly, Urvasí makes another visit to the king (though it be rather unseemly for a nymph to court her lover, yet as she is inaccessible and invisible except by her own consent, the condescension is unavoidable); and prior to revealing herself she overhears the queen making a declaration to his majesty, out of contrition for her late behaviour, as follows:

Whatever nymph attract my lord's regard, And share with him the mutual bonds of love, I henceforth treat with kindness and complacency.

The costume of both Urvasi and the queen are described in the text; the former appears in "the garb of a woman who goes to meet her lover," which is spoken of by the nymph as "purple robes trimmed with pearls;" the queen, who had entered into a solemn vow to forego her ornaments, and hold a rigid fast, till the moon entered a certain asterism, is Chastely robed In modest white; her clustering tresses decked With sacred flowers alone; her haughty mien Exchanged for meek devotion.

After a brief space, occupied by the common-places of lovers' lamentations, Urvasi says:

By virtue of the gift Made of his royal person by the queen, I boldly claim the king.

* For an exposition of this character, peculiar to the Hindu stage, see p. 205.

Pur. I have no purpose to dispute the claim;
 But let me ask, if such assent were needed,
 Who was it that first granted you permission
 To rob me of my heart?

The arrangement seems here complete; and Chitralekhá, the companion of Urvasí, takes leave of the pair, with this admonition to the king:

Till my return

Be careful that this nymph have never cause To mourn the heaven she has resigned for thee.

Mánava. Heaven, indeed! why should she ever think of such a place?—a place where they neither eat, drink, nor close their eyes even for a twinkle.

The last expression affords a remarkable instance of coincidence between the mythological notions of the Hindus and the ancient Greeks. The gods are supposed by the former to be exempt from the momentary elevation and depression of the upper eyelid, and to look with a firm, unintermittent gaze. So Heliodorus, as Mr. Wilson remarks, says: "the gods may be known by the eyes looking with a fixed regard, and never closing the eyelids."

The fourth act is described by the editor as without a parallel in any of the dramas yet met with. "It is almost entirely in Prákrit, and the Prákrit is arranged not only in metrical forms peculiar to that language, but according to particular musical rhythm, as intended to be sung. Again, there are stage directions for the measure to which certain gesticulations are to be performed, so that it partakes both of the operatic and melo-dramatic character; the names of the airs and measures are not current in the present day, nor known to the pundits."

The scene is a forest on the skirts of Mount Meru. The first part of the act consists of a dialogue, intermixed with airs, between the Apsarasas, lamenting that Urvasí, through incantiously intruding into the groves of Kártikeya (being jealous of Purúravas), had been changed into a vine. The king is distracted at her loss, and bewails her in a long soliloquy diversified with occasional airs; the following is an example:

Air

The monarch of the woods, With slow desponding gait, Wanders through vales and floods, And rocks and forest bowers, Gemmed with new springing flowers, And mourns heart-broken for his absent mate. Ah me! whate'er I view but aggravates My woe-These bright and pendulous flowers, Surcharged with dew, resemble those dear eyes Glistening with starting tears. How shall I learn If she have passed this way?-the yielding soil, Softened by showers, perchance may have retained The delicate impression of her feet, And shew some vestige of their ruby tincture. Where in this lonely thicket may I hope To gain some tidings of her?-Yon proud Bird Perched on the jutting crag that stately stands, With neck outstretched and spreading tail to tell His raptures to the clouds-haply may give Some kind intelligence.

Air.

The royal elephant, the dread Of all his rival foes; With downcast eye and tardy tread, Through tangled thickets goes: To solitary grief a prey, His loved companion far away.

I will speak to this peacock—oh tell
If, free on the wing as you soar,
In forest, or meadow, or dell,
You have seen the loved nymph I deplore—
You will know her, the fairest of damsels fair
By her large soft eye, and her graceful air.
(Advancing to the bird and bowing.)

Air.

Bird of the dark blue throat and eye of jet Oh tell me, have you seen the lovely face Of my fair bride—lost in this dreary wilderness? Her charms deserve your gaze—how—no reply?—He answers not, but beats a measure—how—What means this merry mood?—Oh yes, I know The cause—he now may boast his plumage Without a peer, nor shame to shew his glories Before the floating tresses of my Urvasí.

I leave him, nor will waste a thought on one

Who feels no pity for another's woes.

This scene abounds with fine specimens of description; but we have no space for lengthened quotations. Pururavas interrogates, in very poetical language, every object he beholds respecting the lost nymph. At length a voice bids him take up a gem from the ground, and he will "shortly cease to mourn his absent bride." Taking the gem, which is the "ruby of re-union," he approaches the vine into which Urvası was transformed; upon touching it, Urvası is restored to her shape. The act closes with the mutual felicitations of the pair.

Mr. Wilson has displayed in this act great talent in versification, an art in which his Mégha Dúta showed that he possessed considerable skill.

In the last act (for this play has only five) we are introduced to a son of Urvasí and Purúravas, who with his arrow pierces a hawk that had borne away the ruby of re-union, mistaking it for a piece of flesh. The appearance of this prince occasions a great shock to the king, as it must to the judgment of a modern critic of the drama intent upon the unities. The following dialogue ensues upon this subject between Purúravas and the Vidúshaka:

Mán. Joy to your grace! Fate has crowned your wishes.

Pur. How should this be?—but for the interval
Of the Naimisha* sacrificial rite
My Urvasi has always been with me—
I do recall indeed a transient period,
When her soft cheek was paler than the leaf
Cold-nipped and shrivelled—and her eloquent cye
Betrayed unwonted lassitude—aught else
I never noted.

Mán.

* The Naumisheya sacrifice is the great sacrifice performed at the Naumisha forcat by the assembled ages, which lasted twelve years according to the Mahdbhárat, a thousand according to the Bhágavat.

Mún. Oh, you must not suppose that the nymphs of heaven manage these matters like those of earth—No, no—they have the power to counteract all such appearances.

Pur. It may be so; yet why this mystery?
Why keep from me all knowledge of my child?

Mán. Oh there's no accounting for the fancies of celestial spirits.

Urvasí, and a female ascetic who had been entrusted with the care of the boy, attest the genuineness of his birth, in which Purúravas acquiesces without scruple or further inquiry. His delight is, however, extinguished by the announcement of a decree of Indra, by Urvasí, that when she bore the king a son she was to return to Swerga. Naréda, the divine sage, descends to conduct Urvasí to heaven, and the sorrowing king, resigning his throne to Ayus, his son (whose inauguration is performed by Naréda), intimates his design of indulging "in the deer-trod thickets," solitary meditations on his woes. Thus ends the play.

This piece is strikingly distinguished from the first: the peculiarities by which it is discriminated are not, however, likely to recommend it to readers uninitiated in the mythological system of the Hindus, although it be true, as the editor remarks, that none of the monstrous extravagancies of the system are forced upon our credulity. The story is perhaps too simple for dramatic effect, and with the exception Mánava, the Vidúshaka, there is no attempt at individuality in the characters. This character is well drawn; he is an amusing compound of gluttony, timidity, and loquacity. The dialogue is highly poetical, and if the piece in its present dress has not borrowed too much from the translator, it exhibits Hindu poetry in a very attractive light.

Málatí and Mádhava, the third piece in the collection (which is of the 'Prakarana species of the Rúpaka class), is already known in Europe, its plot and part of the dialogue having been given by Mr. Colebrooke,* as observed already. The author of this play, as well as its date, is known with tolerable His name is Bhavabhúti, otherwise Srikantha, a Brahman of Berar or Beder; he wanthe author, likewise, of two other dramas, and flourished in the eighth century, being patronized by Yasoverma, sovereign of Kanouj, who reigned about A.D. 720. "The date thus given to the compositions of Bhavabhúti," adds Mr. Wilson, " is quite in harmony with their internal evidence. The manners are purely Hindu, without any foreign admixture: the appearance of women of rank in public, and their exemption from any personal restraint in their own habitations, are very incompatible with the presence of Mohammedan rulers. The licensed existence of Bauddha ascetics, their access to the great, and their employment as teachers of science, are other peculiarities characteristic of an early date; whilst the worship of Siva in his terrific forms, and the prevalence of the practices of the Yoga, are indications of a similar tendency." The style of the piece is, moreover, referable to an early date, and is besides peculiar to the author: it abounds in the most complicated prosody, and Mr. Colebrooke (in the essay cited) has adduced from it a specimen of a measure of fifty-four syllables in a verse, the stanza consisting, consequently, of 216. Mr. Wilson, however, describes the language as in general of extraordinary beauty and power, and the dialogue as free from the verbal quibbling and extravagance of combination common at a later period; although the author is fond of an unseasonable display of learning, and occasionally substitutes the phraseology of logic or metaphysics for the language of poetry and nature.

* See his essay on Sanscrit and Prakrit prosody, Asiat. Res., vol. x.

We shall not detain the reader by developing the plot of this piece, as this has been performed already by Mr. Colebrooke. The story, it appears, is one of pure invention, that is to say, it is not founded upon any known legend. Mádhava, the hero, and Málatí, the heroine, though designed for each other by their parents, are embarrassed in their love by a variety of crosses obstructions, partly intentional and partly accidental, through supernatural as well as human agency. An under-plot, the loves of Makaranda, the hero's friend, and Madayantiká, the friend of Málatí, contributes to diversify the story, though it is strictly subordinate to the principal plot, with which it is very artfully connected. The action proceeds regularly, the events following each other in gradual succession till the final dénoucment, in the tenth act, which concludes with the restoration of Málatí (who had been carried off to Sri Parvata by Kapála Kundalá, as a victim to the terrific goddess Chámundá, an emanation of Durgá) to her lover, and the union of Makaranda and Madayantiká.

The passion of love, which is the subject of this drama, is treated in a mode which would seem to denote a state of manners in Hindustan essentially different from the present. When nature is suffered to have free scope, indeed, there is not much distinction in this respect between civilized people in all climates. But we were, notwithstanding, unprepared for such a delineation of the passion, in a Sanscrit play a thousand years old, as would suit the most fastidious taste of a modern European. The love of Mádhava is eager, though not impetuous; ardent, though free from the slightest indication of irregular passion. Málatí displays a reserve and delicacy, which, whilst they impart a softness to her character, are contrasted with the more obtrusive, though not immodest, qualities which mark the affection of her friend, Madayantiká.

The dramatis personæ are not few; yet we do not agree with Mr. Wilson, that there is a want of discrimination amongst them. All the personages are at least well defined, and there is even a visible amempt at contrast and opposition in the characters of those whose offices and agency are similar. No attempt at wit is made; a defect which, we are told, Bhavabhúti discovers in all his plays, in none of which is there any character approaching that of the Vidúshaka of the two preceding pieces.

A fair specimen of the descriptive talents of the poet is seen in the account given by Madhava to his friend of his first meeting with Malatí.

By Avalokitá advised-I went To Kámadeva's temple, where I strayed, Till weary I reclined beside a fountain That laves the deep roots of a stately tree, Whose clustering blossoms wooed the wanton bees To cull their sweet inebriating fragrance. Lulled by their songs, and tempted by the shade, I laid me down, and in pure idleness, To while away the time, I gathered round me The new-fall'n blossoms, and assiduous wove A flowery garland-Whilst I was thus employed, There issued from the fane a beauteous maid-Stately her gait-yet graceful as the banner Love waves in triumph o'er a prostrate world. Her train bespoke a princely rank-her garb With youth's appropriate ornaments was graced. Her form was beauty's shrine, or of that shrine Radiant she moved the guardian deity.-To mould her charms whatever nature offers Fairest and best, had surely been assembled. And Love omnipotent was her creator. Led by her maidens to collect the flowers That thickly hung on my o'ershadowing tree. She neared the spot: ah, the too plain I noted The signs of passion, for some happy youth Long entertained, the lovely maid revealed. As slender as the Lotus stalk her shape: As white as unstained ivory her brow. And whiter than the moon-beams: whilst each act, Through kind compliance with her maiden's wishes, Displayed her own indifference. Scarce I gazed Upon her, but my eye felt new delight. As bathed with nectar, and she drew my heart As powerfully as attracts the magnet gem The unresisting ore, at once towards her .-That heart is her's for ever-chance what may, And though my portion be henceforth despair.

Again; a description of a tiger broke loose.

"What ho, beware—in youthful strength and sport The Tiger in the Temple's porch confined, Has burst his iron cage, and roams at large, With tail high waving like a banner—vast And mighty limbed, he stalks along the groves. Now in the midst of mangled forms his paw, As ponderous as the thunderbolt, has folled, The monster stands—and in his maw engulphs, Wide as a cave, the quivering flesh, or grinds The cracking bones with hard sharp-pointed teeth—From his deep broat he roars in thunder loud, And men and beavts fly trembling from the echo; Begrimed with blood and dust he follows fast, And plies insatiate his death-dealing talons—Look to your lives—as best you may, avoid him!"

The only approximation to familiarity in the dialogue occurs in the occasional speeches of Kalahansa, Mádhava's servant, who belongs to that class of characters indispensable on the French stage, and common on every other. The following passage, which is exhibited with a few variations from the original, will shew the style of the familiar parts of the piece, and likewise the mode (termed by Mr. Wilson "clumsy," and "Chinese,") in which the audience is sometimes made acquainted with that part of the action which cannot conveniently be "subjected to the faithful eyes."

Kala. We have got well out of the scuffle—Oh dear me! I think I now see the glittering gleam of the polished sabres flashing in the moonlight—a pretty but awful appearance: and then what a tumult from the hostile force! assailed by the irresistible, merciless, and active Makaranda, they fled in dismay and confusion, with a clamour which filled the whole space of heaven, like that emitted by the tossing waves of Kalindi when they were turned from their course by the mighty plough of Balaráma in fulfilment of the menace that wine had dictated. I shall not forget either the prowess of my master Mádhava—he soon cleared the road of the soldiers: they ran with no little speed, those who could, while covering the road with heaps of various weapons thrown away in their flight, from the concentrated thunder-stroke of his formidable arm.—The king has truly a regard for merit.—His eye dwelt with complacency on the lovely countenances of Médhava and Makaranda as they stood before him on the terrace—whither after the affray was composed by the monarch's attendants they had been respectfully conducted.—Having heard their rank and connexions from me, the youths received every honour, and his majesty turning to Bhúrivasu and Nandana who stood nigh,—their faces as black as ink with rage and disappointment,—said to them very condescendingly; How now, are you not content with kinsmen such as these, ornaments of the world, eminent in worth and descent, and handsome as the new moon?—so saying he withdrew to the interior and Mathava and Makaranda were dismissed:—they are now coming, and I have been sent on before to carry the tidings to the Pious Dame.

The ninth act, in which the author seems to have exerted all his skill in descriptive poetry, is nevertheless tiresome by reason of its length: it consists of lamentations for the loss of his mistress, vented by Madhava attended by his Pylades. Upon the whole, Málatí and Mádhava discovers poetry, pathos, and no inconsiderable degree of dramatic skill.

The Uttara Ráma Cheritra is another piece by Bhavabhíti, and exhibits all his characteristics. Its early date (the eighth century), is decidedly shewn by the allusions it contains to the Védas and some parts of the Hindu ritual now fallen into disuse. "The condition of the Hindu religion," says the editor, "must have been very different, when this drama was composed, from any under which it has been observable for some centuries past."

The subject of the play, as its title implies, is a continuation of the history of Ráma, prince of Ayodhyá (the modern Oude), and comprises the events subsequent to the war which is the subject of the Rámáyana, from the supplementary section of which poem the drama is taken. It is the sequel of the other play written by Bhavabhúti, the Vira Ráma Cheritra, in which the martial exploits of Ráma, as described in the Rámáyana, are dramatised.

To those who are unacquainted with the history of the renowned Ráma, which is now extant in European languages, the summary of the events anterior to the time of the action, prefixed by Mr. Wilson to the play, is indispensably necessary. Our space is too limited for even an epitome of this wonderful chronicle: we must therefore assume that the reader is aware that Ráma was an incarnation of Vishnu, born on earth expressly to overthrow the gigantic Rávana, the usurper of Lanká, a Rákshasa, or evil being, with ten heads and twenty arms; that, after performing prodigies of force and valour in various parts of the continent of India, he was provoked by Rávana, who had carried off Sítá, his wife, to undertake the invasion of Lanká (Ceylon), which he accomplished in conjunction with sundry monkey and fiendish auxiliaries, destroying the giant Rávana, and recovering Sítá, whose purity was vindicated by the fiery ordeal. The incidents which immediately followed the return of Ráma to his capital, form the subject of the present drama.

The play opens in a very agreeable manner by a dialogue between Rama and Sitá, from whence we learn, by the intervention of an ascetic, named Ashtávakra, a messenger from the deer-horned hermit Rishyasringa, that Sita is pregnant. In a following scene, Sitá and Rama are joined by Lakshmana, one of Rama's brothers, and the antecedent events of the history of the heroic pair are rather ingeniously brought in a rapid manner before the notice of the audience, by the remarks of the party on a picture painted upon the walls of the pavilion in which they are seated, representing the deeds of Rama. The dialogue is judiciously distributed amongst the several speakers, and it not only supplies the key to the story, but also discloses the generosity, Asiatic Journ. Vol. 25. No. 148.

3 K

the ardent affection and modesty of the hero Ráma, the tenderness and powerful attachment of Sítá. This scene would scarcely be excepted to in a modern English tragedy. The amorous reciprocations of the newly reunited pair are, however, suddenly interrupted by news that the people with calumnious tongue assail the established purity of Sítá, and reproach Ráma with disregarding his people. The hero, who, taught by Vasishta, the divine sage, his family priest, that—

A king's true wealth, His real glory, is his people's welfare;

declares his readiness-

Pity, pleasure, love,— Nay, even Sitá,—to resign, content, If it be needful for the general good.

He accordingly tears himself from his beloved wife, and condemns her to exile, "to bear her burthen to the lonely woods."

An interval of twelve years occurs between the first act and the ensuing, wherein we are informed by a dialogue between a female ascetic and a dryad of the Janasthána and Dandaka forest, where the scene is now laid, that Rama is preparing an Aswamédha, or solemn sacrifice of a horse—one of the holiest of rites.

Atr. Already the pure steed, o'er whom the charms By Vámadeva spoken, are pronounced, Is loosed to roam at will-his guards attend According to the ritual. By the son Of Lakshmana, the noble Chandraketu, Arrayed in mail, and with bright weapons armed, From heavenly arsenals, the bands are led-Scarce went they forth, when lo, a Brahman brought His son's dead body to the palace gate, And called for succour to the Brahman tribe. Reflecting, when unseasonable death Afflicts his people, that the monarch's faults Must be the cause, full sorely Rama grieved; When to console him came a voice from heaven Commanding him to go forth, and seek Sambúka-One of an outcast origin, engaged In pious penance-he must fall by Rama, And then the Brahman's son will live again. This heard, the king assumed his arms-ascended His car celestial, and he traverses Even now the realms in quest of this Ascetic.

Rama then appears, and we are acquainted by the slaughtered Sambúka himself, who enters as a celestial spirit, that the king of death, awed by the prowess of Rama, had rendered back to life the Brahman's son. Here the monarch is reminded of the earlier events of his life, of which these forests were the scene: he breaks out into the following soliloquy, which is unusually long, but it will serve at once to show the justness of the Hindu poet's expressions, his picturesque fancy, and last not least, the skill of his translator.

'Twas here that long and happily I dwelt, Ere other duties, and the cares of empire, Disturbed my tranquil joys—but such our lot— Each various station has its proper claim—

The hermits calm suits not the rank of king. Nor kingly state the peaceful hermitage.-Scenes of repose, with lavish nature graced; Haunts undisturbed of timid birds and deer; Streams decorated with the untrodden fringe Of flowery blossoms and luxuriant creepers. I know ve well. You distant wavy ridge. Like a faint line of low descending clouds, Defines Prasravana, whose lofty crest Was once the vulture king, Jatáyu's seat; And from whose sides precipitously falls The broad Godáveri-At the hill foot And on the margin of the stately wood, Where the dark trees, upon whose branches bowed Into the broad Godáveri, the birds Sang sweet and oft, our leafy cottage stood. And here is Panchávati, long the witness Of our contented stay, and the abode Of Sita's dearest friend, the fair Vasanti. The kindly genius of these ancient shades. Alas, how changed my fortune !- Sad I pine In lonely widowhood-affliction sheds A deadly venom through my veins-despair, Like a barbed arrow shot into my heart, There sticks and rankles in its cureless wound. Let me beguile the hour, and try to lose The memory of my sufferings, as I gaze Once more on these dear scenes: yet even they Are not unchanged: where once the river flowed A verdant bank extends; and where the trees, Close wove, denied admittance to the day, An open champain bares its breast to heaven-Scarce could I deem the spot the same; but still The mighty landmarks tower aloft, and round The same tall mountains mingle with the skies.

As the ensuing acts, individually, but little forward the business of the plot, the time of each being that of the representation, and the acts being seven in number, we shall pursue the story without interruption.

We learn from a very elegant dialogue between Tamasa and Murala, two river goddesses, that whilst Rama,—

Though exterior calmness screen
His sorrow, deeply mourns his queen;
And his declining form declares
The anguish that his bosom tears:
(For sooner does the soft heart perish,
That loves a secret grief to cherish,
As gourds with coat of clay encased Earliest into ripeness haste);

Sítá has been delivered of two lovely boys,

Whom to the shore Beneath the wave, the realms of shade, The goddess of the stream conveyed; And there, with Earth's great goddess, tended, With pious pains, till time had ended The first and foud maternal care; When Ganga took the nursling pair, To wise Válmiki's* hermitage, And gave them to the assenting sage.

The goddess of the floods then conducted Sítá into the woods

To gather flowers, and with them pay Devotion to the god of day.

Sitá then appears on the stage, as described in the following verses, which display a surprising degree of poetical taste:

Tam. How lovely through her tresses dark And floating loose, her face appears, Though pale and wan, and wet with tears! She moves along like Tenderness Invested with a mortal dress; Or like embodied Grief, she shines, That sad o'er love in absence pines. Mur. Bowed down by anxious thought, she droops, Like the soft lotus as it stoops Its head, when some rude hand has broken The slender stem-those sighs betoken A labouring heart, and withering care With wasteful hand is busy there; For every limb more fragile shows. So when the sun of autumn glows, The tender leaflet languid lies, Shrinks in the scorching blaze, and dies.

Here a very interesting scene occurs: a hubbub is heard from behind the scenes; Sítá's favourite elephant is attacked by a wild one from the woods; the queen involuntarily calls upon her lord to preserve her favourite from destruction, when the voice of Ráma is heard—

Sita. What voice was that?-oh-it comes o'er my soul, Like the low muttering of the thundercloud, That promises refreshing dews to earth, And calls me back to life. Tam. What means this rapture? Why such delight from inarticulate sounds Chance uttered ?-Sita. Inarticulate, saidst thou? To my enraptured car it seemed My dear lost lord had uttered the blest sounds. Tam. It may be-for 'tis noised amongst mankind, The subjugation of the ascetic Sudra. Conducts the hero to this ancient forest. Sita. Thus pays he faithfully the lofty dues Exacted by his station-but he comes-Do I again behold him?-yes, 'tis he; His gait declares him-but how pale and thin, Like the fast waning moon in morning skies! Oh support me! (throws herself into the arms of Tamasá.) Ram. (Rushing in.) Goddess adored, Celestial daughter of Vidéha's kings (falls fainting) Sita. Ah me-ill-fated !-see, his lotus eyes * The celebrated author of the Ramayana.

Close

Close at the sight of me-his deep distress
O'ermasters every sense-Oh save him! save him!

[To Tamasú.

Tam. Dismiss your terrors—you can best restore him:
That gentle hand can bring him back to life.
Sita. Say'st thou?

(Kneels, takes one of Ráma's hands in one of hers, and applies the other to his forehead.)
'Tis so-his spirits are recovering.

Ram. What should this mean? the heavenly balm that wakes The dead to life is poured into my heart; Or from the moon ambrosial dews descend, Drop on my soul, and rouse me to existence. Such is the power that well known touch possesses, To change insensibility to life, And cheer the chill of dark despair with hope. Sita. (Withdrawing.) Oh this is too much for me.

Sta. (Wataraway) of this is too in Ram. Why, was it not My Sua that restored me?
Sua. Ah—my lord now seeks me.
Ram. I will search.
Sita. (To Tamasá.) I must not meet
His gaze uncalled—he will be angry
That I approach him thus unbid.
Tam. Fear not

By Bhagavati's powerful will, enshrined, You walk unseen even by the sylvan deities, Ram. Sita—loved Sita—no—she is not here. Where art thou flown—or was it but a dream? Oft has my fancy anxiously explored My Janaki's retreat, and now, illusively, It finds her in these shades.

Ráma rescues the elephant, and he and Sítá (of whose presence he is still ignorant) re-enter, attended by Vásantí, the guardian spirit of the forest, and Tamasá, the river nymph. The colloquy is here extremely pathetic, though being unaccompanied by action, it must be rather tedious in the representation. Ráma is reproached by Vásantí for driving from him the "gentle being" whose absence he deplores, on account of "the world's reports;" and though, like Collins' Pity, Sítá interposes, ever and anon, to mitigate the harsh condemnation of her lord, the spirit recalls to his startled imagination the disastrous fate that befel his lovely wife when left by Ráma she was carried off by the fiendish Rávana. This suggestion stings him to the quick, and at length the king hastens to complete his solemn sacrifice.

The audience is then transported to the hermitage of Válmíki, which is the scene of the remaining part of the play (except the dénouement), and where most of the characters of the drama are congregated. Hither came, on hearing of the fate of Sítá, her guardian, Arundhatí, wife of the sage Vasishtha, together with Kausalyá, the aged mother of Ráma; here dwelt Janaka, the father of Sítá, formerly king of Mithilá, now an ascetic. In this holy grove, moreover, the twin sons of Ráma, named Kusa and Lava, were educated. The varied dialogues which occur between these characters, as they encounter each other, are pleasing; but this large part of the drama is rather barren of events, and the action of the piece is imperceptibly advanced. The introduction of Lava, one of the sons of Ráma, is preceded by the following description of him by Janaka, who is ignorant of his birth:

His parted locks, dark as the lotus leaf, Denote the warrior tribe, and mongst his fellows, He shows a proud pre-eminence.—

— On either shoulder hangs
The martial quiver, and the feathery shafts
Blend with the curling locks; below his breast,
Slight tinctured with the sacrificial ashes,
The deer-skin wraps his body: with the zone
Of Murvá bound, the madder-tinted garb
Descending vests his limbs; the sacred rosary
Begirts his wrist, and in one hand he bears
The Pipal staff, the other grasps the bow.

These insignia are conformable with the directions of Menu for the military student.

Lava is induced, apparently from a fit of boyish valour, with the aid of other pupils of Válmíki, to drive away the sacred Aswamédhik steed, though guarded, according to custom, with scrupulous care. This insult to the dignity of Ráma (whom Lava had heard of and read of, though he knew not that he was his own father) is resented by the guards of the monarch; a fearful conflict ensues, in which the prince discovers, by the prodigies of strength and valour he performs, his exalted birth, and that he can be no other than "a scion yet unknown of Raghu's (Ráma's) stock." Chandraketu (son of Lakshmana), the guardian of the sacred steed, provoked to emulation by the deeds of Lava, challenges him, and after a long parley, they retire together to "the field of fight." The fray is recounted in a dialogue between a male and female spirit of the air, who describe it as A fearful fight:—less fierce the blows When gods and Titans meet as foes.

The catastrophe is, however, prevented by Raghupati (Ráma), who interposes between the combatants; and Lava, when he learns the quality of the personage who thus interferes, manifests his veneration for the care that and his brother Kusa, excites a strong suspicion in the breast of Ráma that they are members of his family, more especially as he finds they are possessed of a certain magical weapon, or rather a power of enchantment, which appertained to his line and was never to depart from it. The mystery is unravelled in the last act, which is laid in an amphitheatre on the banks of the Ganges. There all the events which have befallen his family since the banishment of Sítá are disclosed to Ráma by means of a play, wherein those events are dramatised. This act is not an inartificial expedient: an example of a similar contrivance (for a different object indeed) occurs in Hamlet. At the end, the family of Ráma are reunited, the benevolent deities assisting at the scene:

The waters of the Ganges are upheaved With sudden agitation—all the sky Is crowded with divinities.

All are now made happy: in answer to an inquiry of Válmíki:

Is there aught else that may require our aid?

Ráma delivers the concluding lines:

Nought, holy sire, but this: May that inspired strain, whose lines impart This tale, 'delight and purify the heart; As with a mother's love, each grief allay,
And wash, like Ganga's wave, our sins away.
And may dramatic skill, and taste profound,
Pourtray the story, and the verse expound,
So that due honour ever shall belong
To the great master of poetic song,
Alike familiar with a lofter theme,
The sacred knowledge of the ONE SUPREME.

There are more defects and more beauties in this play than in any of the preceding. Many of the former must doubtless be attributed to the circumstance of the plot being borrowed from a sacred legend, which constrained the dramatist to adapt his play to the story, instead of accommodating, as he would have done if the events had been fictitious, the fable to the play. The noverty of incident and action in the piece is its greatest drawback; there is too much of narration and description, although both are skilfully executed. The banishment of Sitá, which is the mainspring of the fable, is extremely improbable, or rather no sufficient reason is assigned for it. The specific charge against the queen never appears; when it is referred to by the sneakers, they whisper: this is a mark of the delicacy of the Hindu stage. The characters are not discriminated by any remarkable traits, or contrasted so as to produce a dramatic effect. It must be recollected that the personages of this drama are (in the eyes of the Hindus at least) historical, and that the previously acquired knowledge of the spectator would furnish all that was necessary to give a complete and substantive character to each of them. The merits of the piece are, however, not few: we meet with just thoughts, poetical conceptions, vigorous descriptions, and elegant illustrations. A more just, and at the same time, a more happy elucidation than the following of the different operation of instruction upon weak and strong intellects, cannot be easily pointed out:

The mind alike,
Vigorous or weak, is capable of culture,
But still bears fruit according to its nature.
'Tis not the teacher's skill that rears the scholar:—
The sparkling gem gives back the glorious radiance
It drinks from other light; but the dull earth
Absorbs the blaze and yields no gleam again.

The following thought appears trite only because we meet with it in our own poets:

Nay, give thy sorrows way; sufferers should speak Their griefs: the bursting heart, that overflows In words, obtains relief; the swelling lake Is not imperilled, when its rising waters Find ready passage through their wonted channel.

The descriptions are generally too long for quotation; the following picture of a forest abounds in poetical images:

It skirts these thickets, through whose spacious bounds Wander at will the monsters of the wild. Fierce o'er the mountain stalks the ravenous Tiger, Or lurks in gloomy caves; through the thick grass Curls the vast Serpent, on whose painted back The Cricket chirps, and with the drops that dew The scales allays his thirst. Silence profound Enwraps the forest, save where babbling springs

Gush from the rock, or where the echoing hills Give back the tiger's roar, or where the boughs Burst into crackling flame, and wide extends The blaze the dragon's fiery breath has kindled.

The grasshopper quenching its thirst with the drops of dew on the scales of the huge serpent, is equal to any one of those happy touches for which Shakespeare is so justly extolled.

We have been copious in our selections from this play, because, although it is borrowed from the legends, it displays a very correct taste, and a freedom from exaggeration and tunid magniloquence, hitherto supposed to be inherent in Hindu poetry. "These fictions," says Mr. Mill, speaking of the historical poems of the Hindus, "are not only more extravagant and unnatural, less correspondent with the physical and moral laws of the universe, but are less ingenious, more monstrous, and have less of any thing that can engage the affections, awaken sympathy, or excite admiration, reverence, or terror, than the poems of any other, even the rudest people with whom our knowledge of the globe has yet brought us acquainted. Of the style in which they are composed, it is far from too much to say, that all the vices which characterize the style of rude nations, and particularly those of Asia, they exhibit in perfection."* Such unjust notions of the qualities of Hindu poetry will be unlearned by a perusal of these plays, and particularly of the Utlara Râma Cheritra.

We are compelled to defer the examination of the three remaining pieces by the extreme length to which this article has run.

Hist. of British India, book ii. ch. 9.

IMPUTED LITERARY FRAUDS.

It is desirable that the attention of the literati of British India should be called to the following paragraph, which appears in the Nouveau Journal Asiatique of Paris; the charge it contains ought to have been more specific.

"Father Schröter, a German missionary, who long resided in Tibet, has left a complete dictionary as well as a grammar of the language of that country, commonly called Bhot-yid, or 'the language of Bhote.' He composed these two works from the compilations of preceding missionaries in that country, and from his own observations; hence they are partly in Latin, partly in Italian, and partly in German. The manuscript of F. Schröter has been purchased by the English of Calcutta, and it was placed in the hands of Dr. W. Carey, in 1823, in order to be translated and prepared for the press. The work is about to appear, in one quarto volume, well printed. We hope to find that M. Carey has happily overcome the difficulties attending the publication of a work relating to a dialect of which he is ignorant (qu'on ne connaît pas soi-même). We have also reason to hope that the name of the real author will not be omitted in the title-page of the work, as has happened to several other productions of the same kind published in India."

MADRAS REVENUE SYSTEMS.

To the Editor of the Asiatic Journal.

Siz: The following extracts from the standing orders in the revenue department of the government of Fort St. George were found in an old MS. book. As they are curious, and with the remarks annexed may assist in illustrating the mode of realizing the territorial and other branches of the revenue of the East-India Company a century ago, and that practised at present, you may, perhaps, consider the subject of sufficient interest for publication in the Asiatic Journal.

R.R.

Order, 2d February 1724.—List of farms for the collection of the revenue to be entered in the front of the books of consultations of the Council.

Order, 26th August 1726.—No renters or farmers of revenue to have authority to inflict corporal punishments on the inhabitants.

Remark.—Notwithstanding this humane order, recorded by a British governor in India a century ago, the practice of farmers of revenue inflicting corporal and other punishments continued down to the year 1802 (the date of the establishment of the first courts of justice in the interior of the country), owing to the want of competent courts to check the abuse of delegated power.

Sir John Malcolm's instructions to his subordinate officers in Central India breathe an equal spirit of humanity; but before whom is the neglect or breach of his instructions to be tried?

Order, 9th February 1736.—When leases of revenue farms expire, the collection of the revenue to be put up to auction, and re-let to the highest bidder; the governor and his council being present.

The same orders repeated in 1743, 1749, 1754, and 1757.

Order, 9th June 1753.—Company's servants and merchants, &c. not to rent farms from the country powers (i.e. native princes).

Order, 11th November 1757.—Europeans not to be bidders for, or take leases of, farms of revenue, or to become security for farmers of revenue.

Order, 16th February 1760,—If grounds can be leased out to Europeans with views of improvement, to be encouraged.

Remark.—This appears to apply to small plots of land intended to be cultivated experimentally, and not to leases for the collection of the revenue of entire villages or of many villages.

Order, 13th March 1761.—Sales of farms and revenues to be given to the highest bidder; covenanted servants not excepted.

Remark.—This order repeals the order of November 1757.

Order, 24th December 1765.—No person holding farms under the Nabob of the Carnatic to be admitted as a Company's renter.

Order, 6th April 1765.—Permission to let farms by means of sealed proposals confirmed.

Order, 4th March 1767.—No Company's servant to rent countries, or interfere in the country-government (i.e. government of the native princes), by virtue of any engagement, on pain of dismission.

Order, 31st August 1774.—The letting of lands on leases in every respect the most eligible: employing collectors liable to many inconveniences!

Remark.—No courts of justice existed in the interior of the country in 1774, although the Company had been in possession of the whole Northern disatic Journ. Vol. 25. No. 148.

3 L Circars

Circars and jageer lands since 1765; the cultivators of the land, who paid the revenue to these contractors, must then either have been left entirely at the mercy of the renters and farmers of revenue, or there must have existed a rate of demand established by custom, which the renters could not depart from without exciting an opposition and outcry injurious to their own interests. What more did the great and humane Lord Cornwallis do than change the temporary farmers into permanent farmers, with a beneficial interest; defining their rights to be such, and such only, as the Company, as sovereigns, had exercised—forbidding by law the levy of extra-rates or additions to the customary rates; giving at the same time to the payers of these customary rates courts of justice to appeal to? Not leaving them, as at Madras, from A.D. 1724 to A.D. 1802, no other appeal than to the mercy of the contractors, or farmers of the collection of the revenue.

Order, 17th March 1778.—The character and circumstances of bidders for farms of revenue, and whether connected with any Europeans, to be always reported.

Order, 10th February 1783.—Any Company's servant infringing on the privileges of farmers, under the lease from government, to be suspended the service.

Order, 14th May 1783.—No European to have money concerns with the native powers.

Order, 17th February 1784.—All persons possessed of land or privileges when the grant of the jageer was made by the Nabob of the Carnatic, and still continue in possession, to be considered as the legal proprietors.

Remark .- The word "legal" here used, could in 1784 have no legal consequence. The grant of the jageer was made in 1765. It consisted of a territory forming originally a part of the Carnatic, containing from 2,000 to 3,000 villages, extending thirty miles north, forty west, and from fifty to sixty miles south, of Madras, and was estimated in 1762 to yield an annual gross revenue of about four lacs of pagodas, or, at 8s. the pagoda, £160,000. Courts of justice for the protection of persons and property were first established in this territory in the year 1802, or forty years subsequent to its acquisition. I leave it for consideration whether between 1765 and 1802, in the absence of courts to try legal questions, "all persons in possession of land or privileges when the grant of the jageer was made" still continued unmolested in possession in 1802. I believe it will be found on inquiry, that in all the territories acquired even at so late a period as 1792, 1800 and 1801, under the Madras presidency, the collectors considered themselves at liberty to resume all grants of preceding sovereigns, and to exercise a discretion in restoring or permanently sequestrating the privileges held under such grants, without any appeal existing from such acts of individual discretion to any court of judicature.*

Order, 14th April 1787.—The villages under the chiefs and councils of the subordinate factories, not included in any zemindary, to be managed by Company's servants, with a commission of five per cent. on their net collections.

Remark.—This is the date of the first appointment of Company's servants to act as collectors, and the date of departure from the general practice of always letting out the collection of the revenues to the highest bidder; but the practice of letting many villages and single villages to the highest bidder continued under collectors down to 1801. About the year 1801 the plan of the ryotwar ryotwar mode of assessment and collection was first promulgated. The plan came from the late dominions of Hyder Ally, acquired A.D. 1792. Hyder Ally was a very clever but a very despotic sovereign, remarkably averse from having any intermediate agents, such as rajahs, zemindars, poligars, jageerdars, &c., between himself and his ryots. His process for their removal will be found in Colonel Wilks' History of Mysore. His son Tippoo followed his father's plans, and the success with which he controlled the numerous revenue servants who had supplanted the resident gentry of the country, may also be traced in the History of Mysore. Tippoo's ryotwar management was an entire failure. Tippoo was not Hyder Ally: he was more despotic and more cruel than his father, with much inferior talents for governing. The native collectors under Tippoo Sultan's board of revenue were most of them cruel. tyrannical, and dishonest. A Hindoo's appeal for redress to a Musselman against a Musselman, or of a payer of revenue to the collector of that revenue. against exaction, was not likely to be of much avail. Indeed, the attempt was rarely made. In principle, the ryotwar assessment of Hyder Ally, and that of the Madras government, are the same. In the mode of collection there is no doubt considerable difference.

See Sir Thomas Munro's proceedings in the Ceded Districts of 1800; Appendix to Fifth Report of the House of Commons.

Order, 19th September 1788.—Renters not paying their balances to be confined in the main guard.

Remark.—At the period this standing military-revenue order was recorded, the administration of justice, within the White and Black Town at Madras, was vested in a mayor and aldermen, selected from among the Company's servants and resident European merchants. It will be readily believed that it requires quite a different process to recover a revenue balance, under the King's courts of justice, established since 1799, from that resorted to by the Governor in Council of Fort St. George in the year 1788. If such a course was pursued in 1788, at the seat of government, what course was likely to be followed in the interior of the country by farmers of the collections under no legal control?

SONNET

BY THE LATE NAWAB OF OUDE, AZUF UD DOWLA.

(Translated by Bishop Heber.*)

In those eyes the tears that glisten as in pity for my pain,
Are they geins, or only dew-drops? Can they, will they, long remain?
Why thy strength of tyrant beauty thus, with sceming ruth, restrain?
Better breathe my last before thee, than in ling'ring grief remain!
To you Planet fate has given every month to wax and wane;
And—thy world of blushing wightness—can it, will it, long remain?
Health and youth in balmy moisture on thy check their seat maintain;
But—the dew that steeps the rose-bud,—can it, will it, long remain?
Asuf! why in mournful numbers, of thine absence thus complain?
Chance had joined us, chance has parted!—nought on earth can long remain.
In the world may'st thou, 'beloved! live exempt from grief and pain!
On my lips the breath is fleeting,—can it, will it, long remain?

<sup>* &</sup>quot;I have been reading Hindoostanee to myself, and this morning finished the following translation of one of the poems in Gilchrist's Hindoostanee Guide. From his paraphrase I cannot say derived any great assistance. I have, however, endeavoured to be more faithful than he has been, though the "ruhe ruhe" of the original is, I admit, untranslateable, and only to be imitated afar off."—Journal of a Foyage to India.

PROGRESS OF SCIENCE IN RUSSIA.

THE advancement of Russia in science and literature is an object which cannot be contemplated with indifference by Europe in general, not merely from its tendency to enlighten a very large portion of Christendom, still comparatively ignorant, but from other causes. Russia constitutes a link of communication between Europe and the East; its Asiatic territories are increasing in dimensions; and the intercourse which it keeps up with Persia and China is much more intimate than that of any other European state. The facilities thus afforded to a reciprocal interchange of the products of the mind, whence Europe at large must be a gainer, are great; but like mercantile commerca, this intercourse cannot be carried on profitably for both parties, where either country is rude and uncivilized.

Russia has, however, made astonishing advances in science during the last century; the impulse given by her regenerator, Peter the Great, continued until, in recent times, more efficient and operative causes incited the literation of that country to pursue the paths of intellectual glory—namely, the genuine love of learning, and the emulation inspired by the progress of other nations.

We have been favoured with a copy of the proceedings at the centenary meeting of the Imperial Academy of Sciences at Saint Petersburgh, on the 29th December 1826, at which were present the Emperor, the imperial family, and many of the nobility of the empire. The president, the privy councillor Ouvaroff, delivered on that occasion, a "Discourse," wherein he has given a very comprehensive and luminous sketch of the progress of learning in Russia from the time of Peter; and we think a short abstract of this discourse and of that delivered by Mr. Fuss, the permanent secretary, will be acceptable to the readers of this Journal.

It may not be improper to premise that the Academy was projected in 1724, the last year of the reign of Peter the Great, who drew the outline of it, and was established in December 1725, by an act of Catherine I., who was aware of the interest felt by her illustrious husband in this project (which he cherished to the last moment of his life), and eager to accomplish it. The Empress honoured the second public sitting with her presence, in the year 1726; hence that year is considered as the date of the Academy's commencement. The learned persons associated in this grand scheme for diffusing the light of science throughout this vast empire were selected by Peter; Catherine added to the number Eüler, the two Bernouillis, De Lille, and Bayer.

At the accession of the Empress Elizabeth, the daughter of Peter, who manifested a strong anxiety to forward this grand project of her father, the Academy prospered amidst the tranquillity and general satisfaction which prevailed throughout the empire. "This state of things," observes Mr. Ouvaroff, "was highly favourable to the development of the intellect, and to a taste for the noble pursuits of knowledge and civilization. Under the auspices of a grand and well-established throne, the sciences acquired new vigour. The Academy, confirmed by the regulation of 1747, extended the sphere of its labours. The natural sciences offered a field the more wast and interesting inasmuch as the exact knowledge of the largest empire in the world was intimately connected with their progress. One of those extraordinary genuises, whom-the ray of learning sometimes suddenly illuminates and withdraws from the depths of obscurity—Lomonosoff, not only a celebrated poet, but the first of Russian naturalists, to whom belongs the merit of having created the language.

guage of poetry and the vocabulary of the physical sciences—at that period devoted himself with astonishing ardour to promote the labours and the glory of the Academy."

The splendid epoch of the Academy was the reign of Catherine II. This wonderful personage, whose character presents a combination of the most extraordinary qualities, not only patronised the institution, and gave to it every encouragement which it required from the state, but aided it individually, and devoted much of her leisure time to the cultivation of learning, in conjunction with its members. "She relaxed from the cares of sovereignty," says Mr. Ouvaroff, "in the bosom of this Academy, and we still possess and preserve with peculiar veneration the fruits of her reflections upon the science of legislation, and her observations upon the human mind in relation with the art of government."

Under the auspices of Catherine, expeditions by sea and land were undertaken; the discoveries of Kracheninnikoff, Pallas, Falck, Georgi, Güldenstadt, Ritchkoff, Roumofsky, Gmelin, Lepekhin, and many others of this date, are recorded in the annals of the Academy. The earth was explored and the mineral treasures of the empire were brought to light; botany and zoology were equally indebted to the efforts of the academicians. For the first time, exact accounts of the population, the climate, the courses of rivers, the agriculture, the national industry in the several parts of the empire, were collected and recorded. The manners of the different nations associated under this vast empire were studied; commercial relations and local administrations were revised; geographical charts, hitherto full of errors, were rectified; historical and philological remains were elucidated by the labours of Bayer, Müller, and Schlötzer, and became the objects of general attention. "In a word," says the learned president, "science spurned the narrow bounds of the scholar's closet, and took part in the business of civil life; and the Academy, vivified by the genius of Peter the Great, continued its advances towards the great objects which had been originally assigned to it."

By direction of the Empress, the most distinguished students belonging to the Gymnasium then attached to the Academy, were despatched into foreign countries to perfect themselves in the several branches of knowledge to which they had applied. A museum was likewise formed, consisting chiefly of munificent presents from the Empress, including Dr. Herschel's telescope, and the manuscripts of Kepler.

The Emperor Paul did not withhold his patronage from the Academy: he accepted the title of honorary member; his empress was present at the semi-centenary meeting, in the year 1776. Her imperial majesty was also present at the meeting in 1826, at which this discourse was delivered.

Alexander I., the late emperor, conferred so many benefits upon the institution, that his name deserves to be equally honoured by the Academy with those of Peter and Catherine. By a regulation in 1803, soon after his accession to the throne, he doubled the revenues of the Academy, augmented its privileges, and extended the sphere of its pursuits.

The "Discourse" of the secretary contains an historical sketch of the labours of the society from the year 1728 to the present time. He begins with the mathematical sciences (Mr. Fuss being himself a distinguished geometrician); and he considers that the number and genius of the geometricians who have been members of the Academy have greatly contributed to establish its reputation abroad. He particularizes the labours of Nicholas and Daniel Bernouilli, Leonard Euler, Hermann, Goldbach, Krafft (senior), and Epinus, as evidencing the part which the Academy took in the promotion and improvement of the pure sciences, during the half century which succeeded its foundation, which was the period of the great discoveries in mathematics. The task which devolved upon the subsequent half century, was that of building upon such splendid and solid foundations a more regular structure, of adding new parts, filling up chasms, and strengthening the weaker portions of the work: this task was fulfilled by the veteran Euler himself, and by his disciples J. E. Eüler, Lexell, Krafft (junior), Roumofsky, Kotelnikoff, Nicholas Fuss (the father of the secretary, who filled that post for twenty-six years), James Bernouilli, Schoubert, Gourieff, Viscovatoff, and Collins.

evidencing

After enumerating the discoveries of the academicians in the astronomical departments, the secretary proceeds to those made in geography. Amongst the expeditions which have enriched the records of the academy, and thereby furnished the world with important acquisitions on this branch of human knowledge, are enumerated the journey of the academician Schoubert from St. Petersburgh to Irkutsk, with the embassy proceeding to Pekin; and more particularly the astronomical expedition of the academician Wisniewsky, performed at the expense of the academy, which lasted eight years, and supplied nearly 300 geographical positions.

The natural history of the three kingdoms constitutes another branch of knowledge which owes much to the efforts of the Academy. The expeditions of the two Gmelins, Pallas Güldenstädt, Lepekhin, Falck, and Georgi, not only accumulated much valuable information on these subjects in the memoirs which they inserted in the Transactions of the Academy, but greatly enriched its museum. The results of the expeditions have been recently collected into one work, now publishing in the Russian language. Later contributors, such as Ozeretskofsky, Zouïeff, Radofsky, Adams (who discovered in a glacier the body of a mammoth), Tilesius, and Langsdorff (who accompanied the expedition of Admiral Krusenstern, in the capacity of naturalist), have still further augmented the acquisitions made to natural history and the specimens in the zoological department of the museum. "Scarcely any of these expeditions have been unattended with danger and even sacrifices: Lowitz, senior, was killed by the Cossacs of Pougacheff; Gmelin, the younger, died in captivity amongst the Lesghians; and Güldenstadt, who was enslaved by the same people, owed his deliverance solely to the exertions of a Russian corps under General Medem, who despatched 600 Cossacs to his aid. The Adjutant Chernoi died a captive amongst the Kirgheez; and Falck and Radofsky came to a miserable end, exhausted with the fatigues of a long and painful journey."

Mineralogy, botany, anatomy, and zootomy, or comparative anatomy, have been cultivated in the Academy with equal success; many discoveries have been made in natural philosophy and chemistry: Kirchhoff was the author of the first experiments upon the sugar and brandy extracted from potatoes, as well as the inventor of an excellent method of purifying oils and preparing cinnabar.

The cultivation of history and its auxiliary sciences, antiquities and numismatics, was arrested by the regulation of the Empress Elizabeth in 1747; but the class of history was restored by Alexander, conformably to the regulation of 1803; since which period the academicians Krug, Lehrberg, and Köhler have "dispelled so many errors, and diffused so much light upon dubious points respecting the history and numismatics of Russia, that it may be boldly asserted that these sciences are not less indebted to the Academy than those already enumerated."

The regulation of 1803 gave the academy the power of associating with it scholars of distinguished merit in those departments of learning which were not enumerated in the regulation. "The peculiarly rich collections of oriental curiosities of every kind possessed by the Academy presented a vast field, which promised very interesting results, if a skilful hand could be obtained, capable of extricating them from the obscurity in which they were buried, and of exposing them to the learned world. Another consideration reinforced this desire, namely, that the cultivation of the oriental tongues seemed to promise an accession to our information respecting the history and the ethnography of the empire, not less considerable than the advantage which already resulted therefrom to the relations with the East in respect to commerce and diplomacy. The Academy has accordingly availed itself of this privilege in favour of oriental antiquities, and more recently, from motives equally powerful, in favour of Greek and Roman literature. Hence a new class of philology has been united to that of history, and the Academy has been enabled to add to the list of its members the distinguished names of Fræhn and Græfe: the former has been fortunate enough to discover in Arabic writers an abundant source of valuable data concerning the ancient history of Russia."

Political economy and statistics, though sciences comparatively new, which have engaged the attention of the Academy only for the last twenty years, have yet attracted the regard of several members; and one of them, Mr. Storch, is the author of numerous works on the statistics of the empire, and also of a treatise on political economy, which has met with a flattering reception in most European countries. Schlözer, and especially Hermann, have gained a high reputation in statistical science: the latter has the reputation of having erected a new theory of statistics analogous to the existing state of the political sciences, and built upon a vast number of facts sufficiently esta-

The aforegoing is a slight sketch of the contents of more than 2,500 dissertations, inserted in the seventy-two volumes of the Memoirs of the Academy, or printed separately, each of which contains either some new discovery, some new and interesting fact, or some new method of demonstration or solution, with which the vast domain of the mathematical, physical, and historical sciences, taken in the largest sense, have been enriched.

Out of its own funds, the Academy has expended upwards of half a million of roubles in accumulating objects for its library and museums, of which that appropriated to zoology is remarkable for its richness. The mineralogical cabinet contains some very valuable articles. The Hortus siccus has been recently redeemed from the state of neglect and decay into which it had been suffered to fall prior to 1824, and many specimens have been added to it from all parts of the empire. The cabinet of medals, or the numismatic museum, properly so called, was founded by Peter the Great. It remained, however, neglected till 1823, when the Academy added to its collection the splendid cabinet of Greek and Roman coins belonging to Count Suchtelen, which it purchased for the sum of 50,000 roubles. The formation of this collection had during a long course of years constituted the delight of an amateur whose situation offered every possible means of obtaining whatever was most rare in this way, and who joined to a classical erudition an exquisite taste and a profound and critical knowledge of antiquities. The number of pieces amounts to nearly 12,000. In the same cabinet where this precious collection of coins and medals is deposited, are provisionally placed the valuable articles of gold found in the tombs of Siberia, and which are so well calculated to illustrate the history of that country.

The Asiatic Museum is of but a few years' date; it originated with the present president of the academy, who has always munifested a particular interest towards oriental languages and antiquities, the study of which is in many respects so important to Russia. The end for which this museum was instituted is that of concentrating whatever objects relative to the literature the antiquities, and the arts of the East may be found dispersed in other collections, and thereby to furnish the means of scientific researches into all the branches of Asiatic learning. The many valuable articles of this kind already possessed by the academy formed the basis of this new museum; they consisted of Chinese, Manshoo, Japanese, Mongol, and Tibetan books. printed and manuscript, some of them extremely rare, and including treatises of the utmost importance relative to every branch of literature; also of large apartments of Mahomedan, Chinese, and Japanese coins; also a curious collection of Mongol idols, cast in copper and gilt, forming a complete school for the study of the Buddhist religion; lastly of Chinese paintings, and a prodigious number of instruments, utensils, articles of luxury, productions of art. arms, vestments, &c. of Eastern nations, especially the Chinese and Japanese. This museum has been recently enriched by two valuable and almost inestimable collections of about 700 Arabic, Persian, and Turkish MSS., brought from Bagdad.

The successful exertions of M. Champollion having created a taste for the study of Egyptian antiquities, and M. Castiglione having visited St. Petersburgh with an exquisite collection of those articles, selected by him during his long residence at Alexandria and Cairo, the Academy purchased it of him for 40,000 roubles. It consists of about 1,000 articles, including mummies, statues, bas-reliefs, vascs of alabaster, besides eight rolls of papyrus in excellent preservation. This collection is denominated the Egyptian Museum, and has been carefully arranged by M. Castiglione himself.

The aforegoing details afford a view, unavoidably imperfect, of the labours and acquisitions of the Russian Imperial Academy. We subjoin as a meet conclusion the following ejaculatory sentiments from an elegant Greek ode by the learned professor, Frederick Græfe, addressed to the Academy on the occasion of this its first centenary festival: in the good wishes of Mr. Græfe for the prosperity of this institution we devoutly concur:

Δεῖ δ'ἀνακουφισθέντας ὑπ' ἐλπίσι νωλιμὲς ἐσθλαῖς,

*Ων τ'ἶδομεν μνήμη, κλεινὸν ἀγῶνα θέειν,

'Ἡμέας, οἷς τ' ὀπίσω ποτὲ λαμπάδα δώσομεν αὐτοὶ
Παλλάδος ἀδὲ βίου, καὶ γένος ἐσσομένων,
Εἰκόκεν ἄψ, ἐκατόν γε πιριπλομένων ἐνιαυτῶν,

'Ἡλιος ὀλβίστοις ὅλβιον ἤμαρ ἄγη,
Καὶ δηρὸν κωρὰ τοῦμον στόμα γαῖα καλύψει,

'Ἐμπνεύσει δ'ἄλλφ Μοῦσά τι λαρότερον.

ANALYSIS OF THE CODE OF MENU.

(Continued from p. 339.)

THE sixth chapter of the Code is entitled "On Devotion; or on the Third and Fourth Orders."

The chapter opens with directions for the twice-born man becoming an ascetic, which is the third order; the first being the condition of a student. the second that of a housekeeper. "When the father of a family perceives his muscles become flaccid, and his hair grey, and sees the child of his child, let him seek refuge in a forest: abandoning all food eaten in towns, and all his household utensils, let him repair to the lonely wood, committing the care of his wife to her sons, or accompanied by her. Let him wear a black antelone's hide, or a vesture of bark; let him bathe evening and morning; let him suffer the hairs of his head, his beard, and his nails, to grow continually. Let him be constantly engaged in reading the Véda; patient of all extremities, -niversally benevolent, with a mind intent on the Supreme Being; a perpetual iver, but no receiver of gifts; with tender affection for all animated bodies. et him eat green herbs, flowers, roots, and fruit, that grow on earth or in he water, and the productions of pure trees, and oils formed in fruits; honey nd flesh meat he must avoid, and all sorts of mushrooms.* Let him not eat he produce of ploughed land, though abandoned by any man, nor fruit and oots produced in a town, even though hunger oppress him. Let him slide ackwards and forwards on the ground; or let him stand a whole day on tipoc: or let him continue in motion rising and sitting alternately. In the hot eason, let him sit exposed to five fires; in the rains let him stand uncovered where the clouds pour showers; in the cold season let him wear humid vesure, and let him increase by degrees the austerity of his devotion; and endurng harsher and harsher mortifications, let him dry up his bodily frame." These and other rules (some of which are extremely minute and frivolous, descendng to the number of mouthfuls of boiled grains to be eaten in the bright and lark fortnights of each month respectively) are prescribed to a Brahmen who etires to the woods; and he is further required to study the various upanihads of scripture "for the purpose of uniting his soul to the Divine Spirit." He has the choice of the following penance instead of the aforegoing (which he comment, however, confines to those who are afflicted with any incurable lisease), namely, he may advance in a straight path towards the invincible north-eastern) point, feeding on water and air, "till his mortal frame totally lecay, and his soul become united with the Supreme." It is added: "a Brahmen, having shuffled off his body by any of these modes, rises to exaltation in the divine essence."

The Bráhmen, who thus employs the third portion of his life, enters the fourth order, and becomes a Sannyásí for the residue of it. It is allowable, however, for a Bráhmen, who has performed certain rites accompanied with a gift of all his wealth, to enter the fourth order from his house, or, according to Cullúca, he may proceed even from the first order to the condition of a Sannyásí: nay, "higher worlds are illuminated with the glory of that man who passes from his house into the fourth order." The directions for this transition are as follows: "Departing from his house, taking a said.

Several plants are also interdicted here, amongst which is the bhustrina, or andropogon schonathus, supposed by some to be spikenard.

with him pure implements (his water-pot and staff), keeping silence, unallured by desire of the objects near him, let him enter into the fourth order. Alone let him constantly dwell, for the sake of his own felicity, observing the happiness of a solitary man, who neither forsakes nor is forsaken, let him live without a companion. Let him have no culinary fire, no domicil; let him (when very hungry, says the gloss), go to the town for food; let him patiently bear disease; let his mind be firm; let him study to know God, and fix his attention on God alone. Let him not wish for death; let him not wish for life; let him expect his appointed time, as a hired servant expects his wages. Delighted with meditating on the Supreme spirit, sitting fixed in such meditation, without needing any thing earthly, without one sensual desire, without any companion but his own soul, let him live in this world seeking the bliss of the next." There is something impressive and imposing in the latter portions of this passage; they are immediately followed by such directions as these: "let him not go near a house frequented by hermits, or priests, or birds, or dogs, or other beggars. His dishes must have no fracture, nor must they be made of bright metals: a gourd, a wooden bowl, an earthen dish, or a basket made of reeds, has Menu, son of the self-existing, declared fit vessels to receive the food of Brahmens devoted to God." The transition from "the sublime to the ridiculous," seems a characteristic of this extraordinary work,

A Sannyásí is, moreover, to wear his hair, nails, and beard clipped (unlike the ascetic); to carry a dish, a staff, and a water-pot; to demand food only once a day, "at the time when the smoke of the kitchen-fire has ceased, when the pestle lies motionless, when the burning charcoal is extinguished, when people have caten, and when dishes are removed," that is, at the close of the day; he is not to cat much at a time; nor be anxious about his utensils; he must walk, though with pain to his body, continually looking on the ground, for the sake of preserving minute animals by night and by day, and by way of expiation for the death of such creatures as he may have destroyed unknowingly, he must make six suppressions of his breath, after bathing; "for as the dross and impurities of metallic ores are consumed by fire, thus are the sinful acts of the human organs consumed by suppressions of the breath." The subjects of his reflections are enumerated in the following verses, which are curious:

Let him reflect on the transmigration of men caused by their sinful deeds, on their downfall into a region of darkness, and their torments in the mansion of Yama;

On their separation from those whom they love, and their union with those whom they hate, on their strength overpowered by old age, and their bodies racked with disease;

On their agonizing departure from this corporeal frame, their formation again in the womb, and the glidings of this vital spirit through ten thousand millions of uterine passages;

On the misery attached to embodied spirits from a violation of their duties, and the unperishable bliss attached to them from their abundant performance of all duties, religious and civil.

Let them reflect also, with exclusive application of mind, on the subtil indivisible essence of the Supreme Spirit, and its complete existence in all beings, whether extremely high or extremely low.

Let him observe, with extreme application of mind, the progress of this internal spirit through various bodies, high and low, hard to be discerned by men with unimproved intellects.

He who fully understands the perpetual omnipresence of God, can be led no more captive by criminal acts; but he who possesses not that sublime knowledge shall wander again through the world.

The

The following sentiment, though quaintly illustrated, is just in itself, and not unskilfully expressed: "A mansion with bones for its rafters and beams, with nerves and tendons for cords, with muscles and blood for mortar, with skin for its outward covering; a mansion infested by age and by sorrow, the seat of malady, harassed with pains, haunted with the quality of darkness (or possessing the quality of passion), and incapable of standing long; such a mansion of the vital soul let its occupier always cheerfully quit."

Pious meditation is thus imposed upon the Sannyási, as a means of shaking off sin below and reaching the Most High. But it is expressly added, that "no man who is ignorant of the Supreme Spirit can gather the fruit of mere ceremonial acts." This very important qualification of those passages wherein the highest rewards are attached to mere outward formal acts should ever be borne in mind.

The chapter concludes with a declaration of the importance of the Brahmen housekeeper, who is regarded as the parent and chief of the four orders, viz. the student, the married man, the hermit, and the anchorite; and with a specification of the duties to be sedulously practised by the four orders; these are tenfold, namely, content, returning good for evil, resistance to sensual appetites, abstinence from illicit gain, purification, coercion of the organs, knowledge of Scripture, knowledge of the Supreme Spirit, veracity, and freedom from wrath.

The seventh chapter is "on government and public law; or on the military class:" in a word, it defines the important duties which belong to kings and rulers.

The Bráhmen author of the code assigns a whimsical reason for the appoint-

The Brahmen author of the code assigns a whimsical reason for the ment of a king:

Since, if the world had no king, it would quake on all sides through fear, the ruler of this (universe), therefore, created a king for the maintenance of this system, both religious and civil,*

Forming him of eternal particles drawn from the substance of Indra, Pavana, Yama, Súrya, of Agni and Varuna, of Chandra and Cuvéra:

And since a king was composed of particles drawn from those chief guardian deities, he consequently surpasses all mortals in glory.

Like the sun, he burns eyes and hearts; nor can any human creature on earth even gaze on him.

He is fire (Agni) and air (Pavana); he, both sun (Súrya) and moon (Chandra); he, the god of criminal justice (Yama); he, the genius of wealth (Cuvéra); he, the regent of waters (Varuna); he, the lord of the firmament (Indra).

A king, even though a child, must not be treated lightly, from an idea that he is a mere mortal: no; he is a powerful divinity who appears in a human shape.

The "right divine and sacredness of kings" were never maintained more boldly; yet we shall presently find that towards Brahmens the power of a llindu king is extremely limited; he is not even permitted to tax them.

The duties of a king are expressed very poetically, and therefore somewhat vaguely. He is to prepare a just compensation for the good, and a just punishment for the bad, never transgressing the rule of strict justice. "For his use Brahmá formed in the beginning of time the genius of punishment, with a body of pure light, his own son, even abstract criminal justice, the protector of all created things." Punishment is accordingly defined to be the true manager of public affairs, the dispenser of laws, the governor of all manager.

&lt;sup>8</sup> Mr. Haughton translates this vene thus: "Since this world, on being destitute of a king, quaked on all sides, therefore the Lord created a king, for the maintenance of this system (locomotive and stationary).

kind, the perfection of justice. " When rightly and considerately inflicted. it makes all the people happy; but inflicted without full consideration, it wholly destroys them all." The chapter is very full in its encomia upon punishment, which is described as the efficient ruler not of mankind merely but even of celestial as well as irrational beings: "Deities and demons. heavenly songsters and cruel giants, birds and serpents, are made capable, by just correction, of their several enjoyments." Punishment unjustly inflicted by a king, re-acts upon himself to his own destruction: punishment will overtake his castles, his territories, his peopled land, with all fixed and moveable things that exist on it: even the gods and the sages will be afflicted and reascend to the sky. Amongst his chief duties are behaving with lenity to Brahmens, respectfully attending to their lectures on ethics, and constantly abiding by their decisions; from them he must learn habits of modesty, composure, and humility; "through want of humble virtue many kings have perished with all their possessions," some examples of which are enumerated: and on the other hand, instances are given in which virtue united to humble behaviour has secured to the possessor sovereignty, wealth, and even exaltation to the Brahmen class! From Brahmens the king is to learn the triple doctrine comprised in the three Védas, together with the primeval science of criminal justice and sound policy, the system of logic and metaphysics. and sublime historical truth." The theory of the "practical arts," such as agriculture and commerce, he must learn from "the people."

The vices incident to a king are declared to be eighteen, ten of which proceed from love of pleasure, and eight spring from wrath; the whole being rooted in a selfish inclination. The ten produced by love of pleasure are: hunting, gaming, sleeping by day, censuring rivals, excess with women, intoxication, singing, instrumental music, dancing, and useless travel. The eight generated by anger, are: tale-bearing, violence, insidious wounding, envy, detraction, unjust seizure of property, reviling, and open assault. Drinking and battery are declared to be the most abominable in each set of vices respectively, "too frequently prevailing in all kingdoms." An enlightened prince is enjoined to consider vice as more dreadful than death: "after death a vicious man sinks to regions lower and lower; whilst a man free from vice reaches heaven."

The ministers of a king, seven or eight in number, must be men whose ancestors were servants of kings; who are versed in the holy books, brave, skilled in the use of weapons, and of noble lineage, i. c. Bráhmens. With these he must consult; and having ascertained their several opinions, apart and collectively, he must do " what is most beneficial for him in public affairs." One Brahmen distinguished amongst the others, must be his chief confidant. His subordinate officers must be men of integrity, well informed, steady, "habituated to gain wealth by honourable means," active, able, and well instructed; the brave, skilful, well-born, and honest, he must employ " in his mines and in other similar works;" the pusillanimous in the recesses of his palace. His ambassadors must be of illustrious birth, versed in all the Sástras, capable of understanding hints and external signs, generally beloved, dexterous in business, endued with an excellent memory, acquainted with countries and times, handsome, intrepid, and eloquent. The ambassador has the immediate regulation of peace and war; the forces of the realm are to be immediately under the commander-in-chief; the king is immediately to regulate the treasury and the country.

The capital in which the king resides is to have, by way of defence, a desert, or a fortress of earth, of water, of trees, of armed men, or of mountains;

tains; the latter is recommended as possessing many transcendent properties: in particular, mountains are represented to be the residence of gods. "One howman placed on a wall is a match for a hundred enemies; and a hundred, for ten thousand." The fort is to be supplied with weapons, money, provisions. engines, and Brahmens. The king is to build his palace in the centre of the fort. Here he must make sacrifices with gifts; " and for the full discharge of his duty let him give the Brahmens both enjoyments and wealth." According to the gloss of Culluca, the enjoyments are to be legal, and the wealth moderate. But what follows seems to imply that there should be no limit; for it is said that an oblation or gift to a Brahmen is far better than offerings to a holy fire: a oift to a Brahmen who has read all the Védas yields fruit which is infinite. It is declared to be an unperishable gem deposited by kings with the sacerdotal class; "it is a gem which neither thieves or foes take away; which never nerishes:"-a passage which reminds us of our Saviour's expressions in his Sermon on the Mount: " lay up for yourselves treasures in heaven, where neither moth nor rust doth corrupt, and where thieves do not break through and steal."

The king's revenue is to be received through his collectors; he must in this respect act as a father to his people, conformably with the divine ordinances; that is, we must conclude, be moderate in his assessments. He must appoint intelligent supervisors to inspect the acts of his officers.

The duties of a king in war are then specified: he must by no means turn his face from battle: " never to recede from combat, to protect the people and to honour priests is the highest duty of kings, and ensures their felicity." Kings who act bravely in battle, ascend after death directly to heaven. Kings and men of the military class generally are interdicted from the use of concealed weapons, arrows mischievously barbed or poisoned, darts blazing with fire: *neither must they strike (from a car or on horseback) an enemy on foot : nor an effeminate man, nor one with closed palms (supplicating for life); nor one whose hair is loose (obstructing his sight); nor one who sits down (fatigued); nor one who says "I am thine" (becomes a captive); nor one who sleeps; nor one who has lost his coat of mail, or is naked, or disarmed; nor a spectator who is not a combatant; nor one fighting with another man; nor one who has broken his weapon, or is afflicted (with sorrow), or has been grievously wounded, or is terrified, or who turns his back. "The soldier, indeed, who fearing and turning his back, happens to be slain by his foes in an engagement, shall take upon himself all the sin of his commander, whatever it be; and the commander shall take to himself (the fruit of) all the good conduct which the soldier, who turns his back and is killed, had previously stored up for a future life."

Booty taken in war (except gold and silver) is the lawful prize of the captor; but he must lay the most valuable articles before the king; what has not been individually taken the king is commanded to distribute amongst the whola army collectively. The articles enumerated as booty include women.

The four-fold rule of a king in war is thus laid down: "What he has not gained let him strive to gain by military strength; what he has acquired let him preserve by careful inspection; what he has preserved let him augment by legal modes of increase; and what he has augmented let him dispense with just liberality."

A king

\* It would hence appear that pyrotechny was employed in war even in these early times: " darts  $_{\rm blazing}$  with fire" must mean a species of rocket.

A king must keep his troops constantly exercised and ready for action, whereby "the whole world may be kept in awe;" he must act without guile himself, and be on the alert to discern that of his foe. There are three modes of reducing his enemies prescribed to a king: negociation, presents, division, and force of arms. The first and last are preferable to the others.

The police and interior government of the kingdom are thus provided for A company of guards under an approved officer is to be placed over a district as protectors of the realm. The kingdom is to be divided into jurisdictions as follows: -Over each town with its district is to be appointed a lord, who is to be under a lord of ten towns, he under a lord of twenty towns, he under a lord of 100 towns, and he under a lord of 1,000 towns; each is to certify to his superior any evils which may happen within his district or districts. The townships are to provide their inferior lords with "such food, drink, wood, and other articles as by law should be given each day to the king by the inhabitants;" a circumstance which denotes that a species of purveyance existed in Hindustan as in the feudal states of early Europe. The lord of ten towns is to have the produce of two plough-lands;* the lord of twenty, that of ten plough-lands; the lord of 100, that of a village or small town; the lord of 1,000, that of a large town. All the affairs of each large town or city are to be superintended by a governor of elevated rank, who is to survey the rest in person, and learn their conduct by means of emissaries. The following clause is curious: " Since the servants of the king, whom he has appointed guardians of districts, are generally knaves, who seize what belongs to other men, from such knaves let him defend his people."

The wages of the king's monial servants are next specifically fixed: for the lowest, a pana of copper (now equal to about three-eighths of a penny sterling) a day, with two cloths every half year, and a drona of grain (a measure of uncertain quantity) every month: for the highest servant, six times the above wages, or about twopence farthing per diem. It is a remarkable circumstance, that whilst the king himself and the higher officers of government are to receive their revenue and perquisites in kind, menial servants should be paid in a necessarily variable currency. Mr. Haughton, in his notes upon this chapter, observes: "though the error of the legislator in assigning a specific sum of money as a remuneration of service, is similar to what our own institutions afford many examples [of], yet it could not have been attended with so many disadvantages in India as with us, even had the specification been for other servants besides those of the king; firstly, because even for a long course of ages there seems to have been but little variation in the value of exchangeable produce; and secondly, because the wages were to be accompanied with a certain quantity of grain, apparently sufficient for the servants' maintenance." Both these reasons, are, however, questionable.

Taxes are leviable by the king upon trade and agriculture. In assessments upon traders, the king must ascertain the rates of purchase and sale, the way (i.e. the cost of carriage), the expense of food and condiments, the charges of securing the goods, and the net profits, and tax the merchant accordingly, so levying the taxes "that both he and the merchant may receive a just compensation for their several acts." Of cattle, gems, gold and silver, the king may take a fiftieth part (i.e. of the profits); of grain, an eighth, a sixth, or a twelfth (according to circumstances); of the clear annual increase of trees, flesh-meat, honey, clarified butter, perfumes, medical substances, liquids, flowers, roots, fruit, * Or as much ground as can be tilled with two ploughs, each drawn by six bulls."-Cullica Bhatla.

fruit, gathered leaves, potherbs, grass, utensils made with leather or cane, earthen pots, and all things made of stone, a sixth part. From petty traffickers, the king is directed to take only a mere trifle in the name of the annual tax; and low handicraftsmen, artificers, and servile men, who support themselves by labour, are to do work for the king one day in each month in lieu of payment. Bráhmens, as before observed, are specially exempted from payment of taxes. "A king, even though dying, must not receive any tax from a Bráhmen learned in the Védas."

Much importance is attached to the place and mode of a king's consultation with his principal ministers. He is recommended to ascend the back of a mountain, or go privately to a terrace, bower, forest, or lonely place, where there are no listeners. "At the time of consultation let him remove the stupid, the dumb, the blind, and the deaf, talking birds, decrepit old men, women, infidels, the diseased and the maimed:" women, above all, are to be diligently removed. The subjects of consultation are very multifarious, comprehending the conduct of foreign potentates and the behaviour of the women in the private apartment.

The king is exhorted to consider the power immediately beyond him as hostile; the power next beyond that as amicable; and the powers beyond that as neutral.

Copious directions follow in regard to the conduct of a war; these directions are generally of the most obvious kind. The king who is intent upon an expedition must set out in a particular month, unless he has a clear prospect of advantage, and having secured his route, he must form his troops either like a staff, or a wain, or a boar, or a Macara (species of sea-monster), or a needle, or the bird of Vishnu, concealing himself in the midst of a squadron formed like a lotus-flower. He must encourage his own troops, devastate his enemy's country, and secretly bring over to his party the opposite leaders, and when a fortunate moment is offered by heaven, he should give battle. "Yet he should be more sedulous to reduce his enemy by negociation, by well applied gifts, and creating divisions, than by hazarding at any time a decisive action." This precept seems inconsistent with a former. Having conquered a country, he must respect the deities adored in it, and their priests; he must establish a prince of the royal race, gratifying the new prince and his nobles with gems; give largesses to the people, and not alter their laws. "By gaining wealth and territory, a king acquires not so great an increase of strength as by obtaining a firm ally, who though weak, may hereafter be powerful."

The relaxations of the king are prescribed with equal precision as his duties. After consultation with his ministers, exercise, and the bath, he may enter his private apartments and take food, "hallowed by texts of the Védas repulsive of poison." He must swallow with his food such medical substances as resist venom, and he must wear such gems as repel it. After eating, he may divert himself with his women in the recesses of the palace, and "having idled a reasonable time," he must return to his martial and civil duties; having eaten a second time, and been recreated with musical strains, he is to retire early to test.

"This perfect system of rules," says the last verse, "let a king, free from illness, observe; but when really afflicted with disease, he may intrust all these affairs to his officers."

Like the preceding chapters, these two discover occasionally just and excellent sentiments, amidst a mass of puerile and unmeaning matter.

ANTHROPOPHAGY AMONGST THE BATTAKS.

THE Observer and Chinese Chronicle of Malacen, of July 31, contains the following reply to the Quarterly Review, respecting the practice of anthropophagy amongst the Battak nation in Sumatra.

It has often been doubted whether there exists on the face of the globe any nation so barbarous as to be without a religion of some kind. Amongst some tribes of the Battaks, it must be confessed, as Mr. Marsden states, that their religion is so obscure in its principles as scarcely to afford room to say that any exists, and traces of it are nearly as indiscernible as among the Carians of Ava, the inhabitants of the Pelew Islands, or the aborigines of New Holland: and hence they have no stimulus to a good action, and nothing to deter them from a bad one.* Destitute then as the Battaks are of the finer feeling of relia gion, which bind man to man, and of the susceptibilities engrafted by education; and reflecting upon the brutality of uncultivated savages in all parts of the world, there seems as little improbability that the rajah of Tanah Java. and a few other Battaks, should, from habitual indulgence in eating human flesh in the bodies of enemies and criminals, form as decided a taste for that food, and hence not stickle about the means of obtaining it,+ as the Otomacs for clay, the Pariahs for carrion, the Kuriliana for bears' liver, the Cochin Chinese for hatched eggs, the Esquimaux for raw blubber, the Frenchman for frogs, the Abyssinian for the Shulada, and John Bull for half-dressed mutton or a half putrid muir fowl.

But, may it not be contended that some races of men are naturally and instinctively addicted to savage propensities, which the attention and care of civilized man has failed to eradicate. On this head it may suffice to notice the intractable character of the Aborigines of New Holland. It has been asserted that the inference to be drawn from the attempts to reclaim them from their barbarous habits is, that the Australians will never be civilized. Englishmen have resided among them more than thirty years, and the most persevering attempts have always been made, and are still making, to induce them to settle, and avail themselves of the arts of life; but they cannot be fixed, nor is it possible by any kindness, or cherishing, to attach them. They have been brought up from infancy in the nurseries of Europeans, and yet the woods have seduced them at maturity, and at once elicited the savage instincts of finding their food in trees, and their paths in the forest—propensities which civil education had only smothered. They have been removed from their native country, and in a foreign land have robbed and run away from their fosterer and only protector. They are the only savages in the world who cannot feel or know that they are naked. The natives of the Andaman islands, and the Semangs of the Malayan peninsula (both degenerate races of negroes) resemble the aboriginal inhabitants of New South Wales in many points of character, and attempts to reclaim them from their savage habits have been found ineffectual.

• &quot; One common character runs through savages of every kind. The empire of the heart is divided between two rival deities or rather demons, selfishness and terror. The chief ministers of the first are lust, hatred, and revenge; the chief ministers of the second are cruelty, credulity, and superstition. Look through the world, and you will find this description apply to barbarlans of every age and country. It is equally the history of Europeans and Africans, of the Pelasgi, who were the progenitors of the Greeks, of the Celts and Scythians, the successive progenitors of the English. All the discoveries of modern circumnavigators confirm the assertion, and though the captivating names of Friendly and Society Islands have been given to the two distinct groups in the vast bosom of the Pacific Ocean, and the inhabitants in several of them have made some progress in the first rudiments of civilization and government, there is not a people or a tribe to be mot with, who are yet in a savage state, that are not slaves to these debasing and tyrannical passions. The gentleness of courtship, or rather the first proof of passion, among the savages of New South Wales, consists in watching the fair one of another tribe to her retirement, and then knocking her down with repeated blows of a club or wooden sword, after which impressive and elegant embrace, the matrimonial victim is dragged, streaming in her blood, to the lover's party, and obliged to acknowledge herself his wife."-The Book of Nature, by John Mason Good, M.D., vol. iii. p. 279.

† The natives of Battak are not ashamed to acknowledge that they are cannibals. Some years ago a Battak servant of a gentleman in Malacca, on seeing his master's child washed, made the following remark: Kalu negri aku anak Ini, tousa chuchl, depangang saja; i.e. "In our country it would be unnecessary to wash this child, he might be roasted at once;" intimating, that as the boy was white and looked clean, he might be eaten without being washed. Another servant of the same gentleman told him that when her grandfather and grandmother became old and useless, a large fire was kindled at the foot of a tree, from the top of which they were let fall into the fire, where they were roasted alive, and afterwards eaten. This she declared to be the customary mode of despatching old people. She also remarked, that the palm of the hrnd was the most delicious part of the body.

‡ Geographical Memoir of New South Wales, by B. Field, Esq., pp. 224-225.

Let us, however, take a still more enlarged view of human propensities, the offspring of superstition and ignorance, and advert to the practices which we find are common to some nations considerably advanced in civilization—habits which we regard with abhorrence. The Hindoo lives in a constant dread of killing an insect, and yet regards the sufferings of his fellow creatures with unnaralleled insensibility. The apathy he manifests even merges into active cruelty. His sick relative is taken to the water-side, and his mouth, nose, and cars stuffed with mud to hasten his dissolution. To what extravagant lengths has not religious fanaticism sometimes led the inhabitants of every country, and what unspeakable barbarities have been committed under the cloak of religious enthusiasm! The Fakcers and Yogces lacerate themselves with whips, lie on beds of iron spikes, suspend themselves by iron hooks, chain themselves to trees, travel long journies, rolling themselves on the earth, and cleach their hands till the nails penetrate through the flesh. And let us not forget the scenes which were formerly familiar in France, when succours were administered.* These succours consisted in blows with a stick, a stone, a hammer, a poker, or a sword. One woman would lie down to be threshed like a bundle of wheat; another stood upon her head; a third, forming a halfcircle, by bending her body backwards, remained in that frightful position. while a stone fifty pounds in weight, fastened by a rope to a pulley, was repeatedly let fall upon the abdomen; a fourth had a plank placed across her while she lay on her back, and bore as many men as could stand upon the plank. Another, it is affirmed, suffered herself to be fastened to a spit, and turned before a fierce fire, until a pullet which was lashed to her back, was fairly roasted. Others voluntarily suffered crucifixion, their hands and feet being nailed to wooden crosses. Another took a fancy to have her gown burnt off her back; but it must be confessed that the illusion of mind could not strengthen the lastmentioned patient against such a trial. Sister Françoise shrieked for help, water was poured upon her, and she was carried away half-scorched, halfdrowned, thoroughly ashamed, and sufficiently punished.

Extravagant as these instances of religious fanaticism are, we find that among many nations, in a still less advanced state of knowledge, superstition assumes even more hideous forms, and induces the commission of acts contrary to every principle which should actuate rational beings. The practice of sacrificing human victims still prevails extensively in many parts of the world. This custom, which Capt. King supposes to be a relic of the horrid practice of cannibalism, obtains universally among the Sandwich islands, and at Owyhee human sacrifices were more frequent (according to the accounts of the natives themselves) themselves) than at any other of the islands. It used to be the custom at Tonga, when the divine chief Toilonga died, to strangle his chief wife: but this practice has been left off.* Bowdich states that the sacrificing of slaves. and firing of muskets during certain festivals, appear to be the leading pastimes of the Ashantee nation in Africa. A man may kill his slave with impunity, and when any person of consequence dies, one or two slaves are immediately sacrificed at the door of the house. On the death of the king, the brothers sons, and nephews of his majesty fire promiscuously amongst the crowd. sacrifices are made, &c. Several of the hearts of the enemy after a battle are cut and eaten. The Dahomians are equally barbarous. It is stated + that in order to water with their blood the graves of the king's ancestors, and to sunply them with servants of various descriptions in the other world, a number of human victims are yearly sacrificed in solemn form, and this carnival is the period at which the shocking rites are publicly performed. Scaffolds are erected outside the palace wall, and a large space fenced in round them. On these, the king, with the white strangers who think proper to attend, and the ministers of state, are seated, and the ministers of state are also present in the space beneath. Into this field of blood the victims are brought in successsion, with their arms pinioned, and the fetisher, laying his hand on the devoted head, pronounces a few mystical words, when another man standing behind him, with a long scimitar, severs the sufferer's head from his body, generally at a single blow, and each repetition of this act is proclaimed by loud shouts of applause from the surrounding multitude, who affect to be highly delighted with the power and magnificence of their sovereign. Human sacrifices were in former ages offered by the Hindoos, a comparatively civilized people; but what can be more shocking than some of the practices still observed? Children are thrown to the sharks in the Ganges; devotees throw themselves into the river; widows are burnt with the bodies of their husbands; many sacrifice themselves under the car of Jaggernauth. The Chinese cast their female infants into the stream; and the papers lately printed by order of the House of Commons shew to what a dreadful extent infanticide prevailed a few years ago in a certain quarter of India. Mr. Ellis proves that infanticide prevailed extensively in the Sandwich Islands. The mothers sometimes buried their children alive.

*Vide Quarterly Review, No. Iv. pp. 32 to 34, and Histoiré des Sectes Religieuses, par M. Gregolre, &c. disatic Journ. Vol. 25, No. 148. 3 N

It has been noticed by many travellers,‡ that the conduct which the Indian islanders observe towards the dead, wounded, and prisoners, is marked with the same want of generosity and the same inhumanity which is found to be the invariable concomitant of the early stages of civilization. Some of the savages of Borneo destroy their prisoners and devour their flesh. The people of Celebes sometimes devour the hearts of their enemies, either to gratify revenge or aggravate their usual ferocity, and there is hardly a warrior of note who, at some period or other, has not partaken of this horrid repast. It is well known that the natives of Macassar, when successful in the chase, immediately cut open the body of the stag or wild ox, and devour the heart raw and warm from the body of the animal, or present it to the chief as a delicacy. The inhabitants of New Caledonia are cannibals, according to Capt. Cook, and the want of provisions is considered as sufficient excuse for their going to war, in order that they may devour the bodies of their slaughtered enemies. The natives of New Zealand are a most ferocious race of cannibals. The Rev. Mr. Marsden,

* Mariner's Tonga Islands, vol. i. pp. 311-312.

† A Voyage to Africa, by John MacLeod, M.D., pp. 57-58.

And by the author of the Indian Archipelago, vol. i. pp. 242-243.

Marsden, who visited that island in the year 1819, refutes any doubts that had been previously entertained relative to this horrid custom. Not only the chiefs who are slain are eaten, but their wives are given up, put to death in cold blood, and eaten by the Areekas or priests. We find many disgusting details of the barbarous habits of the Tonga Islands in Mr. Mariner's book.* In giving an account of a feast after war, he states that the bodies of two hundred men were barbecued and served up with an equal number of hogs and fowls, and two hundred baskets of yams. Every man and woman on the island had a share of each of those articles, whether they chose it or not. Most of the chiefs, warriors, and other ferocious parts of the company partook of this inhuman diet, and several of them feasted on it. Capt. Forest gives a frightful picture of the Harraforas, and represents them as cannibals, drinking out of the skulls of their enemies. The most singular feature in their character is the necessity imposed on every individual of imbruing his hands in human blood. No person is permitted to marry till he can shew the skull of a man whom he has slaughtered. The ornaments of their houses are human skulls and teeth, which are in great request with them. + The inhahitants of Queen Charlotte's Sound were cannibals in the days of Capt. Cook,I and that officer gives some convincing proofs of anthropophagy in that quarter. The Javanese, at a no very distant period, exhibited the same ferocity as some of their neighbours. The ears of the Dutch prisoners who were put to death were sent by one prince to another, his ally, the Prince Mangkabumi, and they were stewed with the flesh of buffaloes and eaten by his soldiery." " The people ate one and all, and bowed in respectful silence." The Dutch were in the habit of receiving from these barbarous allies, baskets full of their enemies' heads as valuable gifts!

To the list of disgusting propensities detailed in the aforegoing article, we may add the following from the North American Review:

There is a horrible institution among some of the Indian tribes, which furnishes a powerful illustration of their never-tiring love of vengeance. It is called "The Manating Society;" and it is the duty of their associates to devour such prisoners as are preserved and delivered to them for that purpose. The members of this society belong to a particular family, and the dreadful inheritance descends to all the children, male and female. Its duties cannot be dispensed with; and the sanctions of religion are added to the obligations of immemorial usage. The feast is considered as a solemn ecremony, at which the whole tribe is collected as actors or spectators. The miserable victim is fastened to a stake, and burned at a slow fire, with all the refinements of cruelty which savage ingenuity can invent. There is a traditional ritual, which regulates, with revolting precision, the whole course of procedure at these ceremonies. The institution has latterly declined, but we know those who have seen and related to us the incidents which occurred on these occasions, when white men were sacrificed and consumed.

Vol. i. pp. 345-346.

† Vide Researches into the Physical History of Man, by J. C. Prichard, M.D.

‡ Hawkesworth's Voyages into the Southern Hemisphere, vol. il. p. 340.

Crawfurd's Indian Archipelago, vol. i. p. 244.

THE CASE OF MR. ERSKINE OF BOMBAY.

To the Editor of the Asiatic Journal.

SIR: On the appearance in the Bombay Courier of the 1st instant of two letters,* one signed A.B., and the other bearing the signature which is sub.

* The following are copies of those letters, which we insert verbatim t

To the Editor of the Bombay Courier.

Sir: If the occurrence in the Oriental Herald of the most barefaced falsehood, asserted with the most unblushing assurance, could now possibly occasion surprise, the article inserted in p. 307 of the number for May would most unquestionably excite astonishment. One advantage, however, certainly not contemplated by the editor, may be derived from it, as it will afford a most excellent criterion for judging of Mr. Buckingham's principles and moral character. For I have every reason to believe that he himself received a copy of the pamphlet alluded to, and he must therefore be well aware that the epithets which he has applied to it are totally unfounded, and that he has, consequently, wilfully and knowlngly published a LIR. This language, I am perfectly aware, is neither becoming nor gentlemanly; but when writing of a man who prostitutes his pen to the circulation of deliberate falsehood and slander, courtes would be misplaced.

Mr. Buckingham, with his usual disingenuity, carefully conceals the title of the pamphlet to which he alludes: but no person acquainted with what has taken place at Bombay during the last four years and a half, can for a moment doubt that the one in question is The Case of Mr. Erskine of Bombay, printed for the perusal of his Priends at Calcutta, and never inserted in any newspaper, as it was found too long for that purpose. At the time, also, when it was printed, there was no supreme court at Bonbay. But so far from this pamphlet being "libellous," it, on the contrary, contains authentic copies of the Recorder's speech on delivering the decision of his court in that case, and of the interrogatories on which Mr. Erskine had been privately examined by the Recorder, and thus fairly lays both sides of the question before the public. At its conclusion, likewise, was added this note. "The preceding statement has, for obvious reasons, been drawn up in a tone of studied moderation. A fuller narrative, with a freer commentary, by the injured individual himself, will probably appear hereafter from another quarter." This statement, in fact, contained nothing but a simple account of the circumstances of the case, to which scarcely a single remark was added. But Mr. Buckingham is a man of too much acuteness not to know, that in drawing up a vindication of one's conduct for the satisfaction of one's friends, the style of unfounded assertion and slanderous aspersion employed in the Oriental Herald would be of no avail, and that, in such a case, conclusive reasoning founded on obvious or well-authenticated facts could alone produce conviction.

But I have no intention of entering into a discussion of the merits of this case, and shall, therefore, merely observe, that it is notorious that Mr. Erskine was deprived of the situations which he held in the Recorder's court without trial and without any public investigation whatever. Will, therefore, Mr. Buckingham, the soi-disant defender and martyr of the Liberty of the Press, affirm, that under such circumstances there was any impropriety in printing and circulating this case for the information of the friends and acquaintances of Mr. Erskine? For I defy him to point out in it a single passage which deserves, in any sense of the word, the term "libellous;" though the object and intention of the pamphlet were certainly to show that the decision of the Recorder's Court was neither just nor legal. But what interminable paragraphs has Mr. Buckingham written, in order to prove the injustice of subjecting a Britonto punishment, or even to any loss, without a previous trial by a jury of his countrymen! The pages of the Oriental Herald have been filled usque ad nauseam with the cases of Buckingham and Arnot, Edwards and Burnet, and hoc genus omne of honourable men; but when a gentleman, to whom Mr. Buckingham was indebted for the most friendly kindness and attention, is deprived, without trial, of situations to the amount of Rs. 23,000 per annum, not a page nor even a paragraph can be spared in the Oriental Herald for any remarks on a case, which prima face certainly afforded much juster grounds for animadversion.

That Mr. Buckingham had good and golden reasons for having hitherto maintained silence on this subject there can be no doubt, and in a mercenary hireling consistency of principle is not to be expected. But prudence might have prevented his aliuding to it in any manner, for, if it be in the least discussed, it will be incontrovertibly proved that in his case, to the stigma of literary prostitution must also be added that of base ingratitude. Callous as Mr. Buckingham, from a long perseverance in circulating "gross and libelious insinuations" and assertions against all who deserve respect, esteem, and admiration, must have become to the contempt of the public, still a regard for his own interest ought to convince him of the expediency of avoiding the agitation of questions, the discussion of which must inevitably expose his total laxity of principle, and his complete indifference to rectitude, integrity, and all moral feeling.

I remain, sir, your most obedient servant,

Bombay, 29th August 1827.

VINDEX.

To the Editor of the Bombay Courier.

Sir: The above is the heading of an article in the Oriental Herald for May, and is as usual full of calumnies, the characteristic feature of that journal. In this paper Mr. Elphinstone is said to have been charged in a public correspondence by a high judicial authority of this place with having had in his scribed to this letter, in which the writers pointed out the false and calumnious nature of an article, inserted in p. 307 of the Oriental Herald for May last, and headed "Governor Elphinstone, the late Governor Adam, and the Indian John Bull," the editors of the several newspapers at Bombay were prohibited by government from publishing any farther discussions on the subject. On this measure I shall hazard no other remark, than that it has appeared singular to every person, that Mr. Buckingham should be at full liberty to circulate the most unfounded and slanderous aspersions, and that those who are best able to refute them should be denied the only means which this country affords of exposing their total groundlessness. But as the reasons which may have occasioned this prohibition cannot apply in England, you will perhaps have no objection to insert the following remarks in your journal.

&quot;GOVERNOR ELPHINSTONE, THE LATE GOVERNOR ADAM, AND THE INDIAN JOHN BULL."

1828.1

In this article of the Oriental Herald, Mr. Buckingham has, with his usual disingenuity, carefully concealed the name of the pamphlet to which he alludes. But I can affirm positively, that since the arrival of Sir Edward West at Bombay, no other pamphlet has ever been published, in consequence of any proceeding in the Recorder's, or Supreme Court, than "The Case of Mr. Erskine of Bombay, printed for the perusal of his Friends" at Calcutta, in October 1823. I have at the same time every reason to believe, that Mr. Buckingham himself received a copy of this very pamphlet, and it will also be found inserted in the numbers of the Calcutta Journal for the 23d, 24th, and 25th October 1823. It cannot, therefore, be doubted but that Mr. Buckingham well knew that this pamphlet did not contain "gross and libellous insinuations against the Chief Justice and Judges of this presidency;" and consequently he must stand convicted of having, in the case of a gentleman to whom he was indebted for many acts of friendship, and for whom he professed both respect and esteem, wilfully and knowingly published a deliberate and injurious misstatement. Because, though the slanderous aspersions contained in this article are directed against other persons, still it is obvious that every reader of it must inevitably conclude that such conduct as admitted of no other vindication than "gross and libellous insinuations," must have been completely indefensible.

The case, however, of Mr. Erskine may be stated in a very few words: That gentleman held two situations in the Recorder's Court, one master in equity, and the other clerk to the court of small causes. In the first of these offices it was never pretended that any irregularity had occurred; but in the latter it was discovered that Mr. Erskine had occasionally signed subpæna tickets before the subpæna had been procured, and had thus given his head clerk an opportunity of issuing them without obtaining the subpœna, and consequently of retaining the fee payable to the sealer;* and that this head possession a certain manuscript (said to be libellous and so forth), and having been the means of sending it to Calcutta and causing it to be printed in the John Bull, through the mean of his friend Mr. Adam. Now I have not the means of ascertaining if ever such a charge was really made, and should conceive it for many reasons very improbable; but as it may naturally be inferred that such a charge, if made, would not long remain unanswered, it is evident that the same sources from which the Herald obtained the information, could with equal facility have given the reply, if truth and candour had been their aim. My object, however, is to state what every body has equally the means of ascertaining, that the said paper, which I conclude can be no other than Mr. Erskine's explanatory sattement, was published, not in the John Bull, but in Mr. Buckingham's own paper, the Calcutta Journal of the 336 October 1823, three months after Lord Amherst had assumed charge of the government, and three months after Mr. Adam had left Calcutta for the benefit of his health, with an editorial paragraph bearing strong testimony to Mr.

Mr. Buckingham's remarks on abuse of the press recoil therefore on himself.

August 20th, 1827. Your's obediently, A. B.

* This was, no doubt, improper; it at the same time deprived the scaler of the court, the nephew of Sir Edward West, of his fee.

elerk had continued to take, for fifteen days, an old established fee of one rupee, instead of half a rupee, to which it had been reduced by Sir Edward West. Such were the crying enormities which induced this recorder, within two or three months after his arrival, to institute a secret inquiry into Mr. Erskine's conduct. For no person ever came forward to make a public complaint with respect to any injustice which he might have received in the court of small causes; nor, to this moment, have Mr. Erskine's friends been able to discover the manner in which Sir Edward West became possessed of the information of which he subsequently availed himself. But Sir Edward West must have known that at the time when he instituted this inquiry Mr. Erskine was in a most debilitated state of health, and that illness had prevented him for several months previously from superintending the business of this office with his usual vigilance.

. But as I cannot state this "Case" more concisely or more forcibly than has been already done in the pamphlet in question, I may be allowed to quote from it the following passages.

" The events which led in June last to Mr. Erskine's being deprived of the offices of master in equity and clerk to the court of small causes appear liable to misconstruction, in consequence of the private manner in which the previous inquiries were conducted. For the charge, delivered by the recorder at their conclusion, must tend to excite suspicions prejudicial to the character of Mr. Erskine; as it is difficult to suppose that a judge, in open court, would impute to any individual charges of the most serious nature unless they rested on sufficient grounds. Unfortunately, also, the health of Mr. Erskine was so impaired by long illness, that he was completely incapacitated from defending himself with that vigour which circumstances required; and as his very life depended on his immediate departure from Bombay, neither time nor ability permitted him to lay before the public a detailed account of the real merits of the case. But he entrusted a friend with all the materials requisite for this purpose, and fully explained to him every point that appeared subject to the slightest doubt or ambiguity. It is, therefore, hoped that the following authentic and impartial statement of all the circumstances connected with this transaction will prove acceptable, not only to Mr. Erskine's friends, but also to every person who has enjoyed the pleasure of his acquaintance, or who may feel interested in the reputation of one who has so distinguished himself by his literary pursuits, and by the meritorious and benourable manner in which he has discharged the duties of various public situations of high importance.

"Mr. Erskine arrived in Bombay in 1804, and, during a period of nineteen years, has uninterruptedly maintained the most deserved character for abilities of the first order, and for the strictest principles of honour and integrity. His education, his habits, his intimacies, his pursuits, his studies, his whole frame of mind, evinced the utter impossibility that he could ever deign to improve his fortune by sordid or dishonest means. His friends might even have blamed him for too scrupulous an abstinence from pecuniary transactions from which a profit, exempt from all suspicion, might have been fairly derived.

"In November 1808 Mr. Erskine was appointed clerk to the court of small causes. He was then unacquainted with the procedure of English courts in respect to the forms of writs, the pleadings, and the process; but as the court of small causes acts as a court of conscience, a strict adherence to forms was not absolutely requisite. Under six recorders, therefore, Mr. Erskine conducted the buiness of this court much to their satisfaction; and from their persuasion that he was anxiously disposed to see justice done to the suitors, any informalities in pleading, or in technical forms, though the subject of occasional remark, never altered their opinion of his fitness for the situation. That all these recorders entertained the highest repect for Mr. Erskine's abilities, for his literary character, and for his intimate knowledge of the manners and customs of the narives, and that they honoured him with sentiments of private regard. is too well known, to the society of Bombay to require remark; but no stronger testimony of the high estimation in which Mr. Erskine was held can be necessary than that he was, without solicitation, and even contrary to some objections which he urged, appointed to be master in equity by the late recorder, Sir W. D. Evans..... that the evidence on which the decision of the recorder's court appears to rest is that of the person accused,* contrary to the established maxim of English law, that no person shall be obliged to criminate himself; and of a book which, as is declared from the bench, is written in hieroglyphics..... narticular mode of proceeding, and under certain circumstances, be administered to an accused person, there is not a shadow of authority to justify the issuing of an attachment on mere suspicion, in order to subject him to an examination on oath, by which alone, and in the first instance, he is to criminate himself. It seems also, sufficiently established that there must be an accuser on oath; that the accused person has a right to be made previously acquainted with the charge brought against him and to be allowed time and opportunity to answer it, and that he may object not only to the substance of the charge but also to the quality of the accuser; nor can a single interrogatory be legally put to him until all these forms have been duly observed.

"But in the present case every one of these forms, so necessary to guard against the exercise of a power of so singular a kind being extended further than absolutely requisite for the attainment of the ends of justice, have been completely disregarded. No accuser has appeared against Mr. Erskine, for it cannot be supposed that the recorder has sustained the character both of judge and accuser; no affidavit has been read in open court; the interrogatories on which Mr. Erskine was examined were never filed; no previous notice of their nature and import was given to him; and, so far from time and opportunity being afforded him to answer them, be never received the slightest intimation that he was to be examined on interrogatories until a summons was put into his hands, at ten o'clock on the 13th June, requiring his attendance in court at eleven o'clock the same day for that purpose. Whether, when thus suddenly called upon to answer, without the least preparation, questions drawn up at leisure and with legal skill, he received that support and indulgence which the law requires, will best appear from a perusal of the annexed examinations.

" But though, as Blackstone observes, 'the making a defendant answer upon oath to a criminal charge is not agreeable to the genius of the common law in any other instance,'+ still this mode of proceeding is in some respects favourable to the person accused. For Blackstone, at the same time, lays it down that 'if the contempt be of such a nature that when the fact is once acknowledged, the court can receive no further information by interrogatories than it is already possessed of, the defendant may be admitted to make such simple acknowledgment, and receive his judgment without answering to any interrogatories;'$\pm$ and further, 'if the party can clear himself by oath he is discharged.' In the last opinion Hawkins also concurs: 'if the party (says he) fully purge himself in his answer to such interrogatories of the whole matter charged upon him, the court will discharge him of the contempt.' The singular applicability of both these rules to Mr. Erskine's case will appear fully in the following remarks: for even before his examination he had admitted that neglect of duty, on account of long ill health, had occurred in his office of clerk of the small cause court; and therefore, as this very neglect of itself corroborated Mr. Erskine's assertion, that he was perfectly ignorant of the irregularifies committed in that office, any interrogatories to this point put to him, not being for the better information of the court, evidently

Mr. Erskine had been privately examined by the recorder on interrogatories, and authentic copies of both these and of the recorder's speech are inserted in the original pumphlet. It is to be regretted that Mr. Erskine consented to this private examination, but confident in his own innocence, he was only anxious to prove it in any manner that the recorder thought best.

<sup>† 4</sup> Blackstone, 287.

I Ibid.

evidently became not only unnecessary, but oppressive. Mr. Erskine also represedly declared on oath, when under examination, that these irregularities were totally unknown to him, and that he had never knowingly derived any profit from them; and consequently every implied imputation of extortion, oppression, fraud, and corruption, contained in the above charge, was introduced into it contrary to the clearest and best established principles of law......

sink into unimportance when contrasted with the following; it is difficult to find a name for them. 'This is necessary, as well for the purpose of example as for that of convincing the native community that the court will protect them from extortion and oppression; to convince them that this court, the peculiar end and object of whose establishment is to protect them from fraud and oppression by others, will not so far forget itself and the object of its institution as to screen or permit fraud and corruption in its own officer, and within its own walls.' I am sorry to say, but I fear that the motive was the same as in the case of the ten rupees: I mean, again to squeeze as much as could be squeezed from the miserable hard earnings of that poor class of people who usually apply for redress to the small cause court.' 'The same facts then again appear in this case as in the last; namely, that a fraud to a considerable extent has been committed, and that it has also been committed for Mr. Erskine's benefit; for it again appears that the fraudulent charge for subpænas has been brought to account, and the money actually received by him.' 'The result of this case is that Mr. Erskine him. self gives an opportunity to his clerks, by signing the subpoena tickets before the subpœnas are sued out, to commit the fraud; the fraud is actually committed, and Mr. Erskine receives the profit of it.'

"These passages occur in a speech of no great length, and which concludes with these remarkable words: 'These are the facts upon which the court is to decide as to their proceedings against Mr. Erskine.'

"By the terms in which this speech on pronouncing judgment is expressed, the court have placed themselves in a singular dilemma: for their decision either rests on the answers of Mr. Erskine to the interrogatories, or Mr. Erskine has been punished not only without trial, but, as far as he knows, without the slightest previous investigation. He is condemned by implication, if not in express terms, of having been guilty of extortion, oppression, fraud, and corruption, and of having received all the money which was derived from the irregularities committed in his office. It will, therefore, perhaps excite surprise to read the following questions and answers:

1. Q. Some of the bills of course have been paid to you, Mr. Erskine?

A. Some of them must have been paid to me, I have brought the books.—[Produces cash book (it ought to have been ledger of costs) and examines it] Yes, in No. 131 the costs appear to have been received.

2. Q. And I suppose in many others too?

A. Yes, in all probability. There is another in No. 116, where the costs have been received, and in No. 105. In No. 132 the same scems to have been the case, and in 139.

3. Q. Do you not look over the items which compose the charge before you take money?

A. I have not looked over each item of the bills; I have been accustomed to trust to the accuracy of the clerk in the office, to whom the duty belongs of making the bills, and included the sum total in the judgment, on being assured it had been made up in the usual form.

4. Q. This was leaving a great deal to the clerk, and he might be cheating you or cheating the public.

A. It was certainly very improper conduct in me, and I am fully sensible of it, and regret it extremely.

"It will not appear surprising that in his particular situation Mr. Erskine should not observe the assumptions contained in the first and third questions; but no money was ever paid to or taken by Mr. Erskine by or from the suitors. It was always received ceived by the purvoe, and regularly entered in those books, so repeatedly and emphatically described as Mr. Erskine's books, but which in fact were the public office records, and as such have been the sole means of establishing the irregularities that had crept into the office. But with whatever object these questions may have been framed, it has been fully compensated by the important admission contained in the 4th question, which fully exonerates Mr. Erskine from the improper acts of his clerk.

"These answers of the defendant, as before observed, ought to have been conclusive with respect to his entire ignorance of any monies having been improperly received in his office, or further direct interrogatories to that point might have been put to him. But not one such interrogatory appears in the examinations, nor a single one regarding extortion, oppression, fraud, or corruption, nor indeed with respect to the subject of the two first points mentioned in the above charge. It is, therefore, self-evident that the judgment pronounced by the recorder rests not on these interrogatories. On what other grounds it rests, if on any, has been most carefully concealed from Mr. Erskine; and to the moment that he embarked, not a circumstance occurred to his recollection which could be tortured into the slightest semblance of such serious offences. It is no part of the object of this statement to supply the remarks that must involuntarily arise on this occasion.

"But as Mr. Erskine knows of no regular judicial inquiry except the interrogatories, which had been framed, after at least one, and that the most important of the office books, had been in possession of the court for several weeks, it is to these interrogatories alone that he can refer for a vindication of his conduct. For though Blackstone very justly observes, that, 'in the courts of law, the admission of the party to purge himself by oath is more favourable to his liberty, though perhaps not less dangerous to his conscience; for if he clears himself by his answers, the complaint is totally dismissed:' yet Mr. Erskine may trust with confidence that no person will ever suspect him of having given a single answer inconsistent with truth, as far as his own personal knowledge extended......

ble that the following remark should appear in the above charge: ' The result of this case is, that Mr. Erskine gives an opportunity to his clerk, by signing the subpornaticket before the subpænas are sued out, to commit the fraud: the fraud is actually committed, and Mr. Erskine receives the benefit of it.' The last conclusion deserves particular remark, as it may appear to rest on the 6th, 7th, and 8th interrogatories of the first day's examination. But all culpability, according to law, depends on the knowledge and intention with which an act has been committed; and, therefore, to impute an act publicly to Mr. Erskine, in such manner as, when connected with other parts of the same charge, could convey no other meaning than that of established guilt, is in direct contradiction to every principle of justice. For not a single interrogatory was put to him, which could have admitted of his denying solemnly so serious an accusation, nor has there been the slightest evidence produced to prove that he, in any manner, knowingly derived any benefit from this fraud. That the fraud has been committed, and that he gave the opportunity of committing it, Mr. Erskine does not dispute; but he affirms that his reasons for signing the subpœna tickets previous to suing out the subpœnas were solely to expedite business, and to spare unnecessary expense to the suitors, and that he never was actuated by any corrupt motives whatever.

"Negligence, for some time past, in performing the duties of clerk of the court of small causes, Mr. Erskine at once admitted, when the irregularities that had occurred in the office were pointed out to him. But on every previous occasion, as well as when under examination on interrogatories, he solemnly declared that he was entirely ignorant of the existence of such irregularities, and that he had never, knowingly, in any manner whatever, benefited by any sum of money which had been improperly received in his office. From all knowledge, therefore, of these irregularities, and from all suspicion picion of having participated in any profit derived from them, Mr. Erskine ought, according to law, to have been considered as completely absolved; and consequently the repeated remarks in the above charge, which allege that the frauds were committed for the benefit of Mr. Erskine, are not only unsupported by the slightest tittle of evidence, but are even refuted by the precise kind of proof which the law has declared in such cases to be complete and sufficient.

&lt;sup>4</sup> The purvoe of course accounted to Mr. Erskine for the balances which appeared on these books in his favour, but whether correctly or not, in all cases, or what ulterior object he might have, it is by no hieran easy to say.

Asiatic Journ. Vol. 25. No. 148.

- "Of this opinion the court seems also to have been on the 16th June: for at the conclusion of that day's examination, Mr. Erskine was informed, after the court had consulted together for about a quarter of an hour, that the court had determined to dismiss him from his offices on the grounds of neglect and inattention in the discharge of his duties. It was at the same time intimated to him, that the court was disposed to give him the option of a trial: that the court did not wish to indict him, but to give him the option of a trial if he was dissatisfied. What the object of such an intimation could be it is impossible to imagine. The grounds stated by the court had been repeatedly admitted by Mr. Erskine, and, of course, if the court considered them as sufficient reasons for depriving him of his offices, he had no remedy but to submit to their decision. A jury could have no cognizance of these grounds; it could neither find by their verdict that Mr. Erskine's admissions were incorrect, nor had it power to reverse the judgment of the court. An appeal to it, consequently, could be productive of no beneficial result; and Mr. Erskine, therefore, expressed his acquiescence in the decision of the court.
- "Even on the 18th June, the recorder, in pronouncing judgment, said that the court will not say whether Mr. Erskine be guilty or not of a participation in the profits of these frauds and extortion, and confined the grounds of his dismissal to carelessness and criminal negligence. In what manner, then, is the conclusion of this extraordinary charge to be reconciled to what precedes it; and still more, how can the injurious imputations implied in it be held consistent with the intimation given to Mr. Erskine, that neglect and inattention alone were the grounds on which the depriving him of his offices had become expedient?
- " The accused person is thus lulled into security; and, though the decision of the court is not absolutely different from what was intimated to him, the recorder avails himself of the opportunity of pronouncing judgment to aggravate this decision by imputing to Mr. Erskine, in terms too plain to be misunderstood, extortion, oppression, fraud, and corruption. Can it for a moment be supposed that such ruinous and dishonouring accusations can have proceeded from the seat of justice without resting on some foundation? But if so, what are the facts? by whom were they brought to the notice of the recorder? why was not Mr. Erskine indicted for such serious offences? Nor let it be forgotten that, though ex-parte statements and depositions, taken in due form of law, are sufficient for commencing a process against an individual, they are utterly null and void as grounds on which any court of justice can rest its final judgment. Before the property, or the life, or, dearer to him than his life, the reputation of a British subject can be endangered by the law, the accuser and the accused must appear in public court; the evidence must be given in presence of the latter, who must have legal assistance, and be allowed the fullest opportunity of cross-examining the witnesses brought against him, and of exposing their turpitude; and by a still more invaluable precaution, the conclusions to be drawn from the proceedings are not entrusted to the judge, but to a jury. Why, then, has Mr. Erskine been deprived of the privileges of his birth-right; and why has a solemn judgment, which, amongst strangers, must cast some suspicion on his character, and which has deprived him of yearly emoluments to so considerable an amount, been thus pronounced? It is not sufficient to say that he is an officer of the court, for that could not deprive him of the rights of a British subject; and, besides, the law has pointed out a particular mode of proceeding which may be adopted in such cases, and has, at the same time, expressly declared, that if the defendant clears himself by his answers, the complaint must be totally diamissed. " Through-

"Throughout the whole of this case the reader's astonishment must have no doubt been excited to find, after such frequent references to Bapoo (Mr. Erskine's head clerk), who, as it clearly appears, was the only person who could possibly afford any information with respect to the minute particulars which constitute the subject of this inquiry, that this man was never examined. It is known that he was committed to gaol on the 12th June, with strict injunctions that no person should be allowed to communicate with him; but as no mittimus accompanied the prisoner, and as he had been discharged without trial, the cause of his commitment can only be a subject of conjecture. This circumstance is, therefore, one of the facts of this anomalous case which is particularly perplexing. Had, indeed, the commitment taken place subsequent to Mr. Erskine's first examination, it might have been attributed in the following answer:

Q. Mr. Erskine, you are confident you told Bapoo not to charge more than half a rupee?

d. I am certain I mentioned it. I am confident I charged Bapoo, at the same time I reduced the fee to the sealer, not to charge to or receive more from the client.

But his having been committed previously sets conjecture at defiance. As, however, he was a private servant of Mr. Erskine's, and in no sense of the term an officer of the court, it could not in such case have been for a contempt of court; or, if considered in the latter character, it was a clear admission that the court held him responsible for the overcharge, it would seem to follow that the thus fixing the responsibility on the clerk completely exonerated the head of the office from such responsibility. But in either case, whether by the above answer of Mr. Erskine, or by this supposed admission of the court, it is fully established that the overcharge was made contrary to Mr. Erskine's orders, and consequently that, though the overcharge might have been an appropriate instance of negligence, it could not possibly prove any thing more.

"It may be said that the examining Bapoo could have been of no use, as it would have amounted to nothing more than making master and servant mutually witnesses for each other. But this objection is merely apparent, for they would of course have been examined apart from each other, and a skilful cross-examination would at once have ascertained whether their respective depositions were in every respect inconsistent with each other, or whether any contradictions took place. It is, at the same time, impossible to understand how the court could form any opinion on the subject without this man's testimony. The most important of the office books is declared to be written in hieroglyphics; and even books and papers kept in the most distinct manner ought never to be considered as evidence against the keeper of them until he has had an opportunity of explaining the manner in which they are kept, and every difficulty that might occur to the casual peruser of them.

"As, also, there was no reason, primá-facie, to doubt that Bapoo was the person who had actually received the monies arising from the irregularities committed in the office, it seems inconceivable how any court, without previously examining him, could take upon itself to declare solemnly that these monies were not taken for the profit of the receiver, but for the benefit of another person. Still stranger, if possible, must it appear that the same person, who had himself admitted that the clerk might be cheating either his master or the public, should adjudge that the master alone was guilty. Here every principle of evidence seems to be disregarded, and not even an attempt made to connect the conclusion with the premises.

 and he therefore continued to hold it until he was finally deprived of it by the judgment of the Recorder's Court, on the 18th June."

There was, also, another point most improperly introduced by the Recorder into his speech on delivering the judgment of his court in this case, as it formed no part of the interrogatories on which Mr. Erskine had been privately examined, and animadverted upon by him in the most unwarrantable terms, which in this pamphlet receives the following conclusive reply:

"The first point is with respect to a single instance of Mr. Erskine's having demanded a fee of ten rupees from a Parsee woman, who, though warned of the charge that would be made, had refused to come to the office, for attending her at her house. In the above charge this circumstance is noticed in these terms: 'On what ground Mr. Erskine can attempt to excuse this, I do not know; I have heard from him no attempt at excuse, though he has had many opportunities given him for the purpose.' And farther :- 'I do not understand how he could have so far forgotten his feelings as a gentleman, and his principles as an honest man.' But so far from this first assertion being the case, Mr. Erskine, on being sent for by the Recorder on the 13th May, distinctly stated to him that, as there was no fee laid down on the table of fees in the court of small causes for business done out of the office, though it was laid down for other offices, he (Mr. Erskine) thought the fairest analogy to go by was the practice of the commissioner of affidavits, who, in his office, receives one rupee for swearing an affidavit, but had ten (it ought to have been said fifteen) if he left it. Of the correctness of this conclusion no doubt can be entertained, for such is the established practice in all courts when an officer performs any service, for the accommodation of a party, to which he is not bound by his official duties; nor can any reasonable cause be assigned why the officer, when thus acting out of the regular course of his duty, should submit gratuitously to such inconvenience and trouble. The right, therefore, that Mr. Erskine had to require a fee on this occasion to a certain amount, the Recorder himself could not possibly question; and consequently the introduction here of the word 'honest' is not in any manner warranted by the circumstances of the case. The amount of the fee might, indeed, have been in the Recorder's opinion excessive; but even then, as no fee was laid down, the taking it ought, in common justice, to have been merely ascribed to an error of judgment on the part of Mr. Erskine."

Under these circumstances, will Mr. Buckingham maintain that no remarks ought to be made on the judgment of a court of justice, however illegal it may be, and that the party injured must suffer in silence without attempting to expose its injustice and illegality? For, unless a plain and impartial statement of the circumstances of a case and of the law applicable to it constitute a libel, this pamphlet deserves not in any sense of the word the term libellous. But what interminable pages has Mr. Buckingham written in order to prove the injustice of subjecting a Briton to punishment, or even to any loss, without a previous trial by a jury of his countrymen!*

The specious and hypocritical profession, with which this article closes, proves

• In the Oriental Herald for January 1827, the editor hesitates not to observe:—" It has happened, unfortunately for ourselves, that the discussion of an individual case has occupied a very large, and, as some may consider, disproportionate share of our space and attention. But it may at least be conceded to us, that during all the period of this painful and protracted discussion, no great general question, no important public interest, and no other case of individual oppression has been overlooked or neglected." In another part of the same number, p. 85, Mr. Buckingham has the unblushing effrontery to affirm that "his love of free discussion is not an idle sound: and provided statements are made, on authorities which he has every reason to regard as accurate, and which, being placed in the hands of others, are analyzed with no other desire than that of stating the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, he should hold himself a traitor to that freedom of the press for which he has done and suffered so much, if he appressed such truth." I leave it to him to reconcile such professions as these to his having preserving an ungrateful silence with respect to the case of Mr. Erskine, until it afforded him as epportunity of publishing unfounded and calumnious assertious against Mr. Elphinstone and Mr. Adamnroves nothing more than Mr. Buckingham's inveterate love of misrepresentation: for, if he had been ready to communicate to the world any thing in contradiction of his own calumnies, he held in his own hands full means for refuting them; as for this purpose all that was requisite was to have given a concise and faithful summary of the contents of this pamphlet. For the question, evidently, is not whether Mr. Elphinstone may have seen it in manuscript,* but whether there was any impropriety in printing and circulating it for the satisfaction of Mr. Erskine's friends; and this, I suspect, even Mr. Buckincham himself will not have sufficient assurance to affirm. But, from this namphlet having been inserted in his own journal, he has implicated himself in a dilemma the most embarrasing: for, if it contains "gross and libellous insinuations" against the judges of Bombay, its insertion in the Calcutta Journal shews that the suppression of that newspaper was perfectly just; and if, as I maintain, it does not, what opinion ought to be formed of Mr. Buckingham's moral character, when it is so clearly proved that not even the certainty of detection can deter him from indulging in the most unfounded and virulent detraction?

Mr. Buckingham may, however, plead that this insertion of what he now terms a libel in his own journal had escaped his notice or recollection; but even his ingenuity in defending a bad cause and his assurance will find it impossible to explain away or to repel the injurious consequences to his own reputation which must result from his having written and published this one short nassage:-" The chain of evidence in this case completely establishes the fact of a connexion between Mr. Elphinstone, Mr. Adam, and the Calcutta John Bull, and is equally creditable to them all. Mr. Elphinstone has the libellous manuscript in his possession, before it is published; it afterwards appears in the John Bull of Calcutta, the secret organ of the Bengal Government; whilst Mr. Adam (who was Mr. Elphinstone's first cousin, and whose acts towards the Indian press Mr. Elphinstone has so extravagantly praised) was a member of the Bengal Government." For, not to notice the exquisiteness of this logic, and the striking connexion of the links of this so termed chain of evidence, it must be perfectly obvious that, if Sir Edward West has made any charge against Mr. Elphinstone, this assertion can form no part of it, as it is so clearly a gratnitous and malignant supposition of the ex-editor of the Calcutta Journal. But Mr. Buckingham must know that the supreme court was not established in Bombay until the 8th May 1824, nearly seven months after this pamphlet was printed (in October 1823); that consequently neither Mr. Elphinstone nor Mr. Adam could possibly have been privy to the printing and circulating a libel upon the chief justice and judges of Bombay; and that, if this pamphlet be in any respect objectionable, Mr. Adam could have had no concern in permitting, or prohibiting, or punishing its publication, as he was not then at Calcutta, but at sea on his passage to Bombay for the benefit of his health. Any remarks on such clear and incontrovertible proofs of Mr. Buckingham's total disregard of facts must be unnecessary.

I remain, sir, your most obedient servant,

Bombay, 15th September 1827. VINDEX.

<sup>**</sup> We have taken upon ourselves to retrench one passage in this letter, and to moderate the expressions in others, conformably to our rule of excluding, as far as practicable, all harsh personal reflections, however justly they may be applied.

It is fair to add, that a reply to the two letters in the Bombay Courier appeared in the Oriental Herald for last month.—Ed.

Mr. Adam embarked for Bombay from Calcutta on the 12th September 1823, in consequence of it health, and did not return there until four or five months afterwards.

HISTORICAL WORKS AT CONSTANTINOPLE.

PROFESSOR SCHULZ, of Giessen, whose journey through Persia and Turkey, at the expense of the French Government, with a view of making inquiries and acquisitions for the promotion of oriental literature, was adverted to in a letter from a foreign correspondent, published in our last number, has made some interesting communications to M. Saint Martin, of the Asiatic Society of Paris, respecting the contents of the libraries of Constantinople. From extracts of his letters, which appear in the two numbers of the New Journal Asiatique, we obtain the following information.

M. Schulz states that it is difficult to tell the number of libraries which exist in the vast circumference of Constantinople. There are many which are scarcely known to any one, yet are as rich in excellent works as the most celebrated collections. In his first letter, M. Schulz names thirty libraries which he had then visited. His examination of their contents was almost wholly limited to a search for historical manuscripts, which he deemed to be the most important objects; hereby confirming the observation of our correspondent, as to the contempt which the professor entertains for Oriental poetry. Several of these libraries possess no historian, properly so called: many, however, possess works of history of real value—works, the very name of which are unknown in Europe, or which are generally supposed to be lost. M. Schulz has furnished M. Saint Martin with a catalogue of all the historical and geographical works which are contained in sixteen of the chief libraries of Constantinople, reckoned to be the most abundant in historians. Amongst the manuscripts examined by M. Schulz in these different collections, he was chiefly struck with the works of Ebn Alathir, Ebn Alasakir, Ebn Aladim, and Ebn Khaldune, not one of which, to his knowledge he says, is to be found in Europe. When it is likely to be otherwise it is not easy to tell, for M. Schulz says each of these works consists of a large number of folio volumes, to write out which is nearly as impracticable as it is to procure a copy where they are guarded with a sort of religious carc. M. Schulz succeeded in making extracts from Ebn Alathir's work (which is contained in two enormous folio volumes in the library of the Grand Vizir, Ibrahim Pacha, and in six smaller folio volumes in that of Ateef Effendi), relating to the history of Persia, from Kaiomortz to Alexander the Great. The author, as he states in his preface, has inserted in his work the great Tarikh of Tabari. Ebn Alathir is one of the best of the Arabian historians, and merits, according to M. Schulz, the high reputation he enjoys in the East.

The works of Ebn Asakir and Ebn Adeem upon Damascus and Aleppo are termed by M. Schulz colossal: "it is difficult to conceive," he says, "how a single person was able, not merely to compose, but even to copy, a work so gigantic as that of Ebn Asakir, forming eleven volumes folio, and consisting of from 20,000 to 22,000 folio pages in very small writing; in other words, of a million of lines, and from fifty to sixty millions of letters." These two works are of the utmost importance to history.

The other work which chiefly engaged the attention of M. Schulz during his stay at Constantinople was that of Ebn Khaldune, which M. Von Hammer had asserted was not to be found in any one of the libraries of that city. It was found, however, by M. Schulz in the fine library of Ibrahim Pacha, in front of the mosque of the princes of the blood (Shahzadehler-Jamlei); it consisted of seven folio volumes. M. Schulz copied out several of the chapters in the fifth volume, which contains the History of the Berbers, including cluding very valuable details respecting the origin, genealogies, and country of this nation. A translation of these fragments, which is promised by M. Saint Martin, will enable us to judge how far the eulogy of M. Schulz is just, namely, that "Ebn Khaldune is as excellent an historian as he is a judicious philosopher."

It is but just to M. Von Hammer to state that M. Schulz acknowledges that he had long searched in vain for this history; and though the Tarikh-Ehn-Khaldun often appeared in the Turkish catalogues (which are horribly imperfect and erroneous), the work proved to be the prolegomena. He succeded, at last, in finding it, as already mentioned, in the collection of the Grand Vizir, Ibrahim Pacha.

M. Schulz made inquiries, agreeably to his instructions, for Armenian books; he found them to be very rare at Constantinople, owing, he supposes, in a great measure, to the destruction of the library of the Patriarch and those of other Armenians, which were totally consumed in the great fire of 1826.

M. Schulz found considerable difficulty in obtaining admission to the Turkish libraries, more especially owing to the state of agitation in which the government is at present, which renders it more jealous than ever of trifles. The present Sultan has long shewn himself disinclined, M. Schulz says, to encourage scientific researches by Christians in his empire. Not a great while ago, a firman prohibited all the booksellers of Constantinople from selling any Arabic, Persian, or Turkish MSS. to non-Musulmans. This measure would have greatly embarrassed M. Schulz if he had not found means to elude it completely. The Reis Effendi would not even grant a firman for entering the mosques to which most of the libraries are attached, stating, on application, that the Porte was not in the habit of granting permission to enter the mosques except to ambassadors. M. Schulz at length obtained an introduction to some ulemas of influence, who treated him with great politeness and attention, and by their means he was enabled to enter the libraries and copy the manuscripts. He adds: "It was only necessary for me in these visits to assume the Turkish costume, less in order to spare the feelings of the faithful, who might have been scandalized at the sight of a Frank in places consecrated to prayer (and where I observed, almost daily, the sheikhs giving lessons to numerous pupils), than to avoid the singular questions and the fatiguing civihties with which I was always oppressed when I was recognized as a Frank and Christian: for I can assure you (and I shall enter more into detail upon this point in a future letter), it is the highest absurdity to imagine the population of Constantinople to be so intolerant and fanatical as some journals in Europe wish to represent to their readers. It is impossible to read these journals without being provoked at the signal dishonesty which seems to govern whatever they state concerning this capital, and all that has passed within it for some years back."

THE INDIAN ARMY.

To the Editor of the Asiatic Journal.

Sin: By your Journal for February last, I perceive that a reference has been made to the Court of Directors by those in authority at Calcutta, proposing that the amount of pensions to retired military officers shall in future depend on length of service instead of on the rank attained by them. That this alteration in the regulations of the service would be hailed by the officers of the East-India Company's army with delight and satisfaction, I think admits of little doubt, for it is founded on justice, and would forward the object of the East-India Company to reward length of service, and to prevent officers' pensions depending so much on chance of regimental promotion as they do at present.

Although advancement in the East-India Company's army is by regimental seniority, yet there is great supersession from various causes, which cannot be obviated without reverting to the former plan, of all promotions being made in the line, which was found very inconvenient. Supersession or unequal promotion of officers in corps is so great, that it daily happens that some officers gain the rank of lieut. colonel (and some few of lieut. colonel commandant) after twenty-two years' actual service, whilst others remain, after an equal period of service, only captains, and are consequently entitled to only about half the amount of pension their more fortunate brother officers are.

In alluding to these circumstances, I of course make no complaint against our honourable masters, nor any invidious remarks against their fortunate servants; but I take the liberty of mentioning an evil, and of suggesting the mode of rectifying it, with the hope that the matter may be taken up in a quarter where it may meet with due consideration.

According to the present regulations, an officer after twenty-two years' actual service in India may retire on the pay of the rank he has attained, and I believe that, taking the average of the service, officers having served that length of time are generally majors; many lieut. colonels; and some captains. Now the difference between the pension of a captain and of a lieut. colonel being so very great, and slowness of promotion bearing so heavily on many deserving officers, I propose that after twenty-two years' actual service every officer shall be entitled to the pension of major, and after thirty years' actual service to that of lieut. colonel, even if he has not obtained those ranks after those periods of service.

As military officers for the most part rise to those ranks at the above-mentioned lengths of servitude, I should think the East-India Company would not at all object to adding such a clause as I propose to the present military retiring regulations, which might otherwise stand as they are; for I only wish to secure the pension of major to all officers after twenty-two years' service, and that of lieut. colonel after thirty years' service; but I would not prevent those who may be fortunate in their promotion from getting the pension of the rank they may have arrived at.

Besides compensating officers for slow promotion, and putting them on a footing with their more lucky but not more deserving fellow-servants, I conceive the East-India Company's service would be benefited by this regulation being adopted, as it would induce some worn-out and enervated field officers to retire and give place to younger and more active individuals; thereby increasing promotion, which in India is at times so much required to bring forward officers to the heads of corps before their mental abilities and physical powers are decayed.

I will now turn to another point concerning the supersession of officer's. Great dissatisfaction exists amongst the subalterns of the Company's army at the order issued about eight years ago altering the date from which subalterns are to get the brevet rank of captain, for many have been thrown back as much as three years by the alteration, and are daily superseded by officers who get their companies sooner than they do. Several memorials having been sent in on the subject, many subalterns are anxiously hoping that the regulation will be restored to its former purport, that all subalterns shall be promoted to captains by brevet fifteen years after they have been admitted into the service and done duty as officers, and not as at present, fifteen years from the date of the officer's first commission, which in Bengal is not given to him till there is a vacancy to bring him on the strength of a regiment, and this in some cases has not been till three years or upwards after the individual has been admitted into the service and done duty with a corps as an officer.

The new regulation is an anomaly, and at variance with others by which the time a cadet acts as an officer with a corps till there is a vacancy to bring him on its strength, tells as actual service when calculating the period from which an officer is entitled to his furlough or to his retiring pension. It seems ridiculous that an officer is given credit for actual service for the same time in two important cases, and not in a third, and most people are at a loss to discover why the original regulation was altered.

Sir, I have perhaps dilated more on these subjects than you can spare me room for in your valuable Journal, I may therefore on a future occasion endeavour to shew the expediency of the East-India Company urging his Majesty to grant them the power of giving their military officers the rank of colonel when raised to the command of regiments, as was the case previous to the year 1806; and at present I will merely refer your readers and those concerned to the able letter on the matter by a Bengal Captain in No. 8 of the British Indian Military Repository, published at Calcutta in March 1826.

Requesting you will give this letter a place in the next number of your Journal,

I am, sir, your most obedient servant,

London, March 14th, 1828.

A BENGALLEE.

ODE BY KOODRUT.

Translated by Bishop Heber.)

Ambition's voice was in my car, she whispered yesterday,
"How goodly is the land of Room, how wide the Russian sway!
How blest to conquer either realm, and dwell through life to come,
Lulled by the harp's melodious string, cheered by the northern drum!"
But Wisdom heard: "O youth," she said, "in passion's fetter tied,
O come and see a sight with me shall cure thee of thy pride!"
She led me to a lonely deil, a sad and shady ground,
Where many an ancient sepulchre gleamed in the moonshine round.
"And here Secunder sleeps," she cried;—"this is his rival's stone;
And here the mighty chief reclines who reared the Median throne.
Inquire of these, doth aught of all their ancient pomp remain,
Save late regret, and bitter tears for ever and in vaiu?"

TURKISH POLITICS.

THE near prospect of a war on the confines of Europe and Asia, pregnant perhaps with consequences of vast importance to the political interests of both, is one of those subjects which fall within the sphere of this journal All persons who are connected by any tie whatsoever with oriental polities: all who, from motives either of philanthropy or curiosity, are induced to bestow an occasional glance upon the East, must have watched with serious attention the gradual operation of those causes, which, from an early period of the transactions between Turkey and the great powers of Europe, portended that result which seems now to have taken place.

How far these powers are justified in interfering between the Ottoman go. vernment and their revolted subjects the Greeks, is a question which is not to be determined by an appeal to the dogmas of jurists, or even to precedents. In the great association of independent states there must be acknowledged to exist an inherent right of interference in the affairs of each individual state. where extreme cases of political disorder occur, which threaten the peace of the rest.

In the case of Greece, the people spontaneously threw off the voke of subjection to the Porte, on account of the tyranny and vexation which they had endured for many years; and it would be absurd to allege that the grounds of their revolt were insufficient. They were not aided or encouraged therein by any other power; in fact, they have experienced, in several ways, such treatment from their fellow Christians in Europe, as would justify the Greeks in considering them in the light of foes rather than friends. It remained then to be seen whether the Turkish government possessed the means of reducing their revolted subjects to obedience; in default of which, the latter became virtually free. It is a doctrine which, if ever seriously maintained, is by this time pretty well exploded, that an authority can be asserted by one country over another, altogether distinct from it in religion, language, and manners, and originally acquired by conquest, when the former has lost its ability to maintain that authority by force. The latent claim may, indeed, be cherished for the sake of ultimately obtaining some equivalent, as in the case of France and Hayti; but it is contrary to every principle of justice and policy, as well as at variance with precedents in modern history, to hold the doctrine of indefeasible right in such cases.

The Turks had ample time (nearly six years) and abundant opportunities for recovering their lost authority; in spite of these favourable circumstances, and notwithstanding the debilitated condition of Geece, mostly owing to the indiscretions of its rulers, the Turks have failed to re-establish their dominion. What was the course which it was incumbent for the other powers to pursue, in order to put a stop to this interminable contest,—this constant flow of human blood? Doubtless, to interpose by their friendly advice and remonstrances between the parties, and to recommend the Turkish government to consent to the modified independence of Greece, already virtually free.

The great powers of Europe accordingly did so advise, and their advice was rejected by the Porte.

Nothing then remained but that the interposing powers should solemnly prescribe to themselves the measures which, under these circumstances, it was their duty to adopt, in order to secure the welfare of the world at large, as well as that of their own individual states. This step was taken; and the treaty of London, dated 6th July 1827, contains a declaration of the views and intentions of Great Britain, France, and Russia, to the following effect:*

The contracting parties will offer to the Porte to mediate between it and the Greeks; which offer shall be made by a joint declaration signed by the plenipotentiaries of the three powers at Constantinople: and there shall be made, at the same time, to the two belligerent parties, a demand for an immediate armistice, as an indispensable condition preliminary to negociation. The arrangement to be proposed to the Ottoman Porte shall rest on the following terms:-The Greeks shall hold of the Sultan as lord paramount: and shall, in consideration thereof, pay to the Ottoman empire an annual tribute, fixed for ever by mutual agreement. The Greeks shall be governed by rulers chosen by themselves, but in whose appointment the Porte shall have a voice. The details of the separation of the two states, the indemnification to the proprietors of Turkish property in the territories to be occupied by the Greeks, and other subordinate matters, to be adjusted by subsequent negociations between the contracting powers and the two contending parties; and the former engage to follow up the salutary work of the pacification of Greece on these bases without delay. By a secret article, the contracting parties agree, that, if the Ottoman Porte does not accept, within one month, the proposed mediation, the representatives of the three powers at Constantinople shall declare to the Porte, that the evils inseparable from the state of things subsisting in the East for the last six years impose upon the contracting powers the necessity of approximating with the Greeks, by means of commercial relations and consular agents. If within one month the Porte or the Greeks reject the proposed armistice, the contracting powers shall declare to the party wishing to continue hostilities, their intention to " exert all the means which circumstances may suggest to their prudence to obtain the immediate effect of the armistice;" and they will "conjointly employ all their means in the accomplishment of the object thereof." If the Porte shall not adopt the propositions made to it, or the Greeks shall renounce the conditions stipulated in their favour, the three powers will nevertheless continue to prosecute the work of pacification on the bases agreed upon between them. A stipulation in the fifth article of the treaty is as follows:- "The contracting powers will not seek in these arrangements any augmentation of territory, any exclusive influence, or any commercial advantage for their subjects which the subjects of any other nation may not equally obtain."

Before this treaty was communicated to the Turkish government, indeed prior to its execution, the Porte had issued (9th June) a manifesto, with reference to the interference of the resident ministers at Constantinople and the proffered mediation of the European powers, in which the Sultan protests against such a right, alleging that interference on the part of one or more powers in the affairs of another, is destructive of that system and order of things established by the creator in the universe, and to which the flourishing condition of this world is owing; and that if such interference be abstractedly unjust, it is still more so in the case of the Ottoman empire, "the affairs of which are conducted upon the principles of sacred legislation, and all its regulations, national and political, are strictly connected with the principles of religion."

Now the Greeks (says this document), who form part of the nations inhabiting the countries conquered ages ago by the Ottoman arms, and who from generation to generation generation have been tributary subjects of the Sublime Porte, have, like the other nations that since the origin of Islamism remained faithfully in submission, always enjoyed perfect repose and tranquillity under the segis of our legislation. It is notorious that these Greeks have been treated like Mussulmans in every respect, and as to every thing which regards their property, the maintenance of their personal security, and the defence of their honour; that they have been, particularly under the glorious reign of the present sovereign, loaded with benefits far exceeding those which their ancestors enjoyed. But it is precisely this degree of favour, this height of comfort and tranquillity, that has been the cause of the revolt, excited by malignant men, incapable of appreciating the value of such marks of henevolence.

* According to the copy of the treaty published in the newspapers. Although copies of this treaty and of the protocol signed at St. Petersburgh, 4th April 1826, have been laid before Parliament, they have not been printed.

This affords a curious specimen of Turkish sincerity; and if the rest of the allegations contained in this document are as much to be relied upon and no more, the assertion that "at the commencement of the insurrection, some ministers of friendly courts resident at the Sublime Porte offered effective assistance in punishing the rebels," which offer was declined on the ground that the Porte could not admit of foreign interference, is not (as it otherwise would be) entitled to much regard. The document concludes with a declaration that the Porte will neither hear nor understand propositions which require it to renounce its rights on Greece; and that "if, with the aid of the Almighty, the Sublime Porte resume full possession of that country, it will then always act, as well for the present as the future, in conformity with the ordinances which its holy law prescribes with respect to its subjects."

The position taken by the Turkish government is thus, in a great measure, distinct from the ground upon which the allied powers rest their interference, and upon which it is either approved or condemned by the politicians of Christendom.

When the treaty of London was communicated to the Porte by the ambassadors of the allied powers, in August last, the answer returned by the Reis Effendi was a reference to the manifesto just quoted, accompanied by a declaration of the decided resolution of the Sultan to adhere to the principles contained in that document, and to reject the interference of foreign powers between the Porte and its rebellious subjects. This answer on the part of the Turkish government was delivered with a full knowledge that fleets had been equipped by the allied powers, and were at hand to aid in carrying the treaty into effect.

In the month of September an expedition fitted out by the Pacha of Egypt against the Greeks in the Morea, entered the port of Navarin, and the commander, Ibrahim Pacha, soon after commenced what is termed by Sir E. Codrington a "brutal war of extermination" upon the inhabitants of that country. No resistance was offered to the entrance of the expedition into Navarin by the British fleet which was off that port; but its blockade was soon after commenced by the allied squadrons, and it appears that the commanders of the combined forces were instructed to prevent any reinforcement of men and stores being sent to the Turco-Egyptian army in the Morea.

On the 25th September, Ibrahim Pacha, in a conference with the commanders of the allied squadrons, consented to a provisional suspension of hostilities. A violation of his pledge, however, in the perpetration of atrocious cruelties upon the Greeks, men, women, and children, led to the entrance of the allied fleet into the harbour of Navarin, and to the memorable action of the 23d October.

This "untoward" event, for such it may be termed without the slightest imputation upon the commanders of the allied squadrons, necessarily disordered the relative state of affairs between Turkey and the three interposing states; states; and if the Porte, antecedently to that event, stood firmly upon the ground that interference was a violation of its sovereign and independent rights, how much more was it called upon to resist the pretensions of those powers, when that interference had been enforced by the total destruction of a Turkish armament! The view which the Porte was constrained to take of this transaction precluded a consideration of the conduct pursued by its own commander; it was the insult offered to its independence, in thus dictating to a Turkish commander, by force, however blameable might be the conduct of that officer abstractedly.

The question which arose out of the treaty of London thus became embroiled with others, whereby the differences between the interposing and the recusant powers are rendered incapable of adjustment without very material concessions on one side or on both. Great Britain, France, and Russia must virtually annul the treaty of London, or Turkey must recede altogether from her principles regarding interference, which she can hardly be expected to surrender without an appeal to arms.

Hostilities seem, therefore, inevitable: other causes of dissatisfaction have been given by Turkey to one of the allied powers, and manifestos have been reciprocally issued by Turkey and Russia.

In the fifth article of the treaty of London, there is, as already quoted, a declaration that the respective contracting parties will not seek any political aggrandizement under that treaty. Such a renunciation (were we accustomed to attribute much virtue to self-denying clauses in treaties of this nature) is not irreconcileable with as large an appropriation of territory as Russia is able to wrest from the Turks. If a state be forced into a war by the hostile conduct of her natural foe, it is not apparent upon what ordinary principle she can be prevented from making as much advantage of her success as the conquered will allow her. Our Indian Government was forced into the Burmese war much against its inclination; nevertheless, in spite too of our recorded disinclination to further augmentation of territory in that quarter, we did take from the Burmese a part of their territory, and we were justified in so doing.

The other European powers may, indeed, view with jealous eyes the increase of a power already so formidable in extent as Russia, and may interfere to prevent any further increase, upon grounds analogous to those which constitute the incipient principle of interference in Turkish politics; namely, a regard to the general welfare. This interference must be backed, as in the other case, by force; and hence the apprehensions of those who expect great political events in the East and in the West are by no means groundless.

The change in the British ministry since the treaty of London, and an impression resulting from that change, that our government views the objects of that treaty with altered eyes, may have stimulated the confidence of Turkey, and proportionably alarmed the suspicions of the Russian emperor; and hence may have arisen the precipitate haste with which the two powers appear to have adopted a warlike attitude towards each other. Moreover, it must be recollected that Russia is called upon to protect her frontier in time from the ravages of the barbarous troops which form the advanced guard of a Turkish army.

It is consolatory to find from the declarations of the ministry, that the views of government in regard to Greece, as defined by the treaty of London, have not changed. Still it is to be feared that, with so many provocatives as exist on both sides, Russia and Turkey may come into actual collision, on grounds independent of the treaty; and once commenced, a war on the Danube may extend to the Indus.

STATE OF CHINA,

To the Editor of the Asiatic Journal.

Sia: Your valuable work up to May last has reached us in this distant land, and also a journal by Timkowski, relating the circumstances of his mission to Peking in 1820. It is satisfactory to find the affairs of China, communicated from the north, through Russia, to Europe. Timkowski's book is useful respecting Mongolia, and the Archimandrite Hyacinth's portion, which treats of Turkestan. Concerning China Proper there is nothing new, except the envoy's own personal intercourse with the natives of Peking.

The bishop elect of Peking, of whom he speaks, has arrived here on his way to Europe to see his old mother, as the pretext was. The Emperor granted his request, and added, "when your mother dies, you need not take the trouble to return." One old Portuguese, and only one, of all the Romish missionaries, remains at court, and he is under orders to retire.

The pretender to the dominion of Little Bucharia, or Turkestan, Changko-hur Hocho,* of the family of Mahomet, the Arabian prophet, has been driven from Acksa, Koten, Yarkand, and Kashgar, beyond the Chinese frontier, into the territories of the Booroots. His Imperial Majesty of China was very much annoyed at not catching the rebel.

The Peking Gazette has of late been silent on the subject of the western war, and rumour says the rebels have returned to the charge.

Timkowski has made some mistakes; such, for example, as that the Chinese language cannot be printed with moveable types; but there are Chinese books in Peking and in Canton, printed with moveable types, and there are some in Dr. Morrison's Chinese library in London. Still his book is a very useful one for those who take an interest in eastern Asia.

Klaproth, in his usual petulant manner, has done as much as he could by bold assertions, to undervalue the work, and has again shewn his hostility to the English and to Dr. Morrison, whose Dictionary, he says, is full of faults, and is not better than that edited by De Guignes, under the patronage of Napoleon; for it "obliges you to consult the originals." Now the fact is, it gives you the Chinese characters and translations of the phrases, and enables you, by references, to consult many of the originals. It is, indeed, a terrible fault in a dictionary of a foreign language, to enable you to refer to the original works quoted; but Morrison is guilty of doing so; "if indeed," says the sceptical sage, "Morrison be the author of the Dictionary." He has begun to doubt this; he will next assert it; and, in the third place (if his life continue), he will refer to his own writings to prove it.

Modern China abounds with injustice and cruelty. This neighbourhood has been lately shocked by a melancholy case of matricide by poison. The perpetrator, who meant to poison her husband, was instantly hurried before the several courts, and, in the nineteenth year of her age, sentenced to the death called Ta-ling-che. She was bound, carried to Tyburn, denuded, fastened to a cross, arms, limbs, and head cut off, leaving only the trunk, which was stabbed to the heart! Her head was enclosed in a cage, and carried to the place where she committed the crime, to be hung up and exposed to the public, to deter from the repetition of such crimes.

The local magistrate has issued an official account of the transaction, with admonitions appended, addressed to the people; and two ballads have been written written and circulated, by sale, to excite horror in the minds of all young wives, and prevent their disobedience to husband's mothers.

The magistrate says Lo-she, the young woman, was in bad health, and very unable to do the work required by her old mother-in-law, Luh-she. In consequence of this, the mother scolded and struck her, and got her husband and his brother to do the same. They also threatened to take her before the police to have her publicly chastised for her disobedience. Then the mixed feelings of indignation and fear urged her to plot the death of her mother.

The ballads however give a different account: they state that early being left an orphan, her married sister persuaded her husband to bring her up, to which he readily assented. She was beautiful, and, as is usually the case in China, the writer says, therefore miserable. The husband formed the design of seducing her, and he suggested to his wife to go and say masses for the souls of her departed parents at a temple some miles distant. He praised the merit of such an act, and proposed taking the girl, now sixteen, with them. Whilst the wife went to say the prayers for the dead at the temple, he remained in the boat and effected his purpose on the young sister. This illicit connexion was secretly continued till the time of her marriage: one year after which, disliking her husband, she thought of poisoning him, and returning to her paramour; but destiny had not decreed his death; the day when poison was prepared he went out, and his mother ate his portion and died.

The untimely and ignominious end to which Lo-she came is attributed to sins in a former state of existence. She is represented as lamenting her fate, and invoking the spirits of her departed parents to make interest with the King of Hades to let her wait upon them in the invisible state.

Criminals convicted capitally in China are expected to walk to the place of execution, and a loaf of bread is given them to eat. Some hardened robbers go eating their loaf, laughing and joking about their being about to be converted into Shin-reen, divine genii, or angels. The unfortunate Lo-she had a loaf given her, but she could not walk, and was carried sitting on a sort of basket-work borne on men's shoulders. The executioners told her lying stories till the very last moment, when they mocked her by suggesting she would soon become an angel.

In one of the ballads there is some grossness, and in all the documents much hard-heartedness shewn.

Government forced the husband to witness his wife's being exposed and cut to pieces; and they punished him with fifty blows because he shed tears! They affirmed he felt more for his wife than for his mother! Such are the feelings in reference to petit treason in China!

Canton, China, Oct. 23, 1827.

Review of Books.

Mémoire sur les Sources du Brahmapoutra et de l'Iraouaddy. Par M. J. Кілраотн. Paris, 1828.

Ma. Klappoth has been kind enough to forward to us a copy of his Memoir on the Sources of the Brahmaputra and the Irawaddy; and as the articles and the doctrines to which the memoir is intended as an answer appeared in this journal (and were probably known to him by this medium only), we are anxious to furnish a notice of it in as extended a form as possible, in order that the theory of this gentleman, to which the geographers of Calcutta are not friendly, should be properly appreciated by our readers. The most convenient, and perhaps the fairest, course we can pursue, under all the circumstances, in reviewing this memoir, is to compress the substance of it into a compass consistent with our limits, without interpolating any critical remarks of our own upon the merits of the question.

Mr. Klaproth begins by stating, that in an article on the course of the Yarou-dzangbo-tchou (as he writes it), or great river of Tibet, inserted in his Magazin Asiatique, he demonstrated, on the authority of certain Chinese maps, that that river, which had been considered as the higher portion of the Brahmaputra, was entirely distinct from it; that in quitting Tibet it traversed the country of the Mons, named H'lokba or Lokabaja, entered the Chinese province of Yun-nan, near the ancient city of Yung-chow, there receiving the name of Pin-lang-keang,* or Indian areca river; that it then flowed into the kingdom of Mëen, or Ava, and uniting itself, below the city of Bhammo, to another considerable river coming from the north, it formed the Irawaddy, which passes Amerapoora in its course to the gulf of Bengal.

The Chinese maps are, he says, minute in their details respecting this great river; and those drawn up by order of Këen-lung differ materially on this point from those constructed by the Jesuits in the reign of Kang-he: the originals of the latter represent the Yarou-dzangbo-tchou as leaving Tibetin lat. 27° 30′ and long. 20° 50′ W. of Peking (not in lat. 26° 40′ long. 20° 20′, as in the faulty copies of these maps inserted in the work of Duhalde); whereas the maps of Këen-lung place the exit of this river from Tibet and its entry into H'lokba in lat. 28° 40′ and long. 19° 30′. These positive testimonies Mr. Klaproth considered to be fortified by evidence deduced from certain physical phenomena.

Mr. Klaproth, then, referring to the discoveries of Lieut. Burlton,† who ascended the Brahmaputra as far as it was navigable, in lat. 27° 54′ N. long. 95° 24′ E., observes that this officer's account of the dimensions of the river at that place shewed that it could not be the Dzangbo of Tibet, which is described by P. Gaubil as much larger than the Hwang-ho and the great Keang. The information obtained by Lieut. Burlton, moreover, showed that the Lohit or Brahmaputra originated in the Brahma Kund, a small lake situated in some mountains to the eastward. The Brahmaputra and the Dzangbo could therefore have no connexion in that quarter.

The statements of Lieut. Burlton demonstrated to Mr. Klaproth that the Chinese authors were correct as to the course of the Dzangbo, and he described in the map appended to his memoir the course of the Brahmaputra, as well as the details of the English traveller permitted, which, he says, were obscurely given. He proceeds:

* Pin-lang signifies the areca or betel-nut; keang river .- Ed.

† See Asiat. Journ., vol.xxi. p. 52.

" The English at Calcutta display a holy wrath against my memoir; wherefore I know not; probably because a continental man has dared to know something of the geography of countries bordering on India. They have, however, given an extract from this memoir in the Calcutta Gazette of 29th March 1827, which demonstrates that their slender knowledge of the French language has not allowed them perfectly to comprehend me. I observed, in speaking of the maps of the Chinese empire made by the missionaries under Kang-he, 'that copies or sketches (calques) of these maps, translated in China, were put by P. Duhalde into the hands of the celebrated D'Anville, in order that he might reduce them and superintend their publication; that these sketches were very imperfect extracts of the Chinese and Manchoo originals; and that, moreover, the proper names had been translated by a person but little versed in the Chinese language.' The English at Calcutta have understood the passage thus: 'D'Anville, however, (say they) does not seem to have had access to this map, but employed a set of calculations sent by Duhalde from China for his work. These calculations were mere extracts, and far from complete, and the names especially were very erroneous: from these, however, D'Anville compiled the map of Tibet attached to Du Halde's China.' These English writers have thus taken calques, or designs upon transparent paper, for astronomical calculations; and have made these maps be sent from China by P. Duhalde, although this Jesuit, who was for some time secretary to the famous P. Letellier, confessor of Louis XIV., never set foot in that country. I also said that the Jesuits sent a copy of the originals of their maps to the King of France, and that this copy remained up to the period of the revolution in the private library at Versailles. The journalists of Calcutta understood by this that a copy was sent to the Royal Library of Paris. I translated the Chinese name of Pin-lang keang by fleuve de l'arec de l'Inde (areca catechu, Linn.), of which they have made Arrack river of India, as if this river flowed into India, and instead of water was filled with arrack, or punch at least.* Persons who possess so little knowledge of a language are ill-qualified to criticize the writings in which it is employed."

Mr. Klaproth then quotes an edict of Kang-he, published in 1721, wherein that emperor gives a very particular description of the courses of the great rivers of Tibet and China, according to accurate data furnished by the superior Tibetan priests. "From my youth," says the emperor, "I have paid attention to geography; hence it was that I sent grandees to Mount Kwān-lun and into Se-fan. All the great rivers, as the Great Keang, the Hwang-ho (yellow river), the Hill-shwiy (black river), the Kin-sha-keang (gold-sand river), and the Lan-tsang-keang, have their sources in those countries. My envoys have personally examined every thing; they have made accurate researches, and recorded their observations in a map. It plainly results from thence, that all the great rivers of China originate in the south-eastern edge of the great chain of the Nomkoun-oubashi, which separates the hydro-graphical system of the interior from that of the exterior. The origin of the Hwang-ho is without the frontier of Se-ning, to the eastward of mount Kool-koon. Innumerable springs there gush out of the earth, emitting a lustre like that of the stars: the Mongols call them Odun-tala, the Tibetans Solom, and the ChineseSing-so-hae (sea of the abode of the stars). The union of these sources produces the Hwang-ho; it forms the lakes Dzaring and Oring, runs first to the south-east, turns to the north, then returns to the east, passes the forts of Kwei-ta-foo and Tsih-chih-kwan, and enters (China) by-Lan-chow The Min-keang originates westward of the Hwang-ho, in Mount Baïan-kharatsitsirkhana, named in Tibetan Miniakthsono, and Min-shan in Chinese books: it is situated without the western frontier of China: the waters of the Keaner come from thence. It was from mount Nae-chu-shan that Yu directed this river; this mountain is beyond the fort Hwang-ching-kwan, on the frontier of the present province of Sze-chuen. The ancients believed that the sources of the Keang were near those of the Hwang-ho. According to the Yu-kung, the Keang comes from Min-shan: this is not correct; it merely crosses that mountain; this is a fact ascertained. This river flows as far as Kwang-heen. and there divides into some ten branches, which afterwards reunite at Sin-tsinheen; thence it goes off to the east (south-east) as far as Seu-chow-foo, where it unites with the Kin-sha-keang. This last river has its source in the northeast of the states of the Dalaï Lama, at the foot of mount Ooni-vin-oossoo. the name of which in Chinese is Joo-new-shan, or mountain of the cow. The current of water which flows from thence bears the name of Murus-oossoo, and runs to the south-east into the Kam country (a province of Tibet), traverses the country of Chung-tëen, enters Yun-nan, near the fort of Ta-chingkwan, and there receives the name of Kin-sha-keang. At Le-keang-foo, it is called the Le-keang; at Yung-pa-foo it receives the Ta-hang-ho, flows to the east, passing Woo-ting-foo, and enters Sze-chuen, where it unites with the Min-keang at Seu-chow-foo. Farther on, the Keang passes Kwei-chowfoo, enters Hoo-kwang, waters King-choo-foo, and joins the Han-keang before Woo-chang-foo. The Han-keang comes from the Po-chung-shan, a mountain of Nin-keang-chow, one of the districts of Shen-se; at its source it bears the name of Shili-yang-shwuy; it runs to the eastward, and at Nan-ching-heen enters Hoo-kwang, and joins the Great Keang near Han-yang-heen: the joint streams are called Han-keaou. All these rivers are to the south-east, and within the great chain of the Nomkhoun-oobashi, have their sources in Se-fan (Eastern Tibet *), and enter China.

Mr. Klaproth has spoilt his joke, such as it is, by the introduction of punch, which has no necessary comexion with arrack.

" The Lan-tsang-keang has two sources (or is formed by two rivers); one comes from Mount Gerghi-dzagar, in the Kam country, and is called Dza-choo; the other from Dsirukeng-tala, and bears the name of Soom-jo. They unite to the southward of the temple Chamdo, and form the Lak-choo, which enters Yun-nan lower down, where it receives the name of Lan-tsang-keang. It there flows to the south, as far as the government of Chih-le, where it obtains the name of Kew-lung-keang (river of the nine dragons) and proceeds to the kingdom of Meen-teen, or Ava. To the westward of the Lan-tsang-keang runs another river, named Kara-oossoo, which is the Hih-shwuy of the Yukung, and the modern Loo-keang of Yun-nan. It comes from the north-east part of the states of the Dalaï Lama, and flows out of the Kara-noor (black lake), runs to the south-east, traverses the Kam country, passes by the habitations of the Noo-e, receives the name of Noo-keang, and enters by Ta-tang-yae into Yun-nan, where it is called Loo-keang; thence it flows to the southward, enters the government of Loo-keang, a department of Yung-chang-foo, and then pursues its course to the kingdom of Mëen-tëen.

Mëen-tëen. To the westward of the Loo-keang is the Lung-chuen-keang. Its source is also in Kam, on Mount Chumdo; it flows to the south, enters Yun-nan to the west of Ta-tang-yae, is called Lung-chuen-keang, and at fort Hun-lung-kwan penetrates into the kingdom of Mëen-tëen.

"There is still another river which passes the extreme frontier of Yun-nan, namely the Pin-lang-keang (areca-nut river); its source is in Ngari, a province of Tibet, to the east of Mount Gangdis, on Mount Damjuk-kaba, or Horse's mouth. Lower down, this stream receives the name of Yarou-dzangbo; it flows generally to the eastward, deviating a little to the south; passes through the country of Dzangghe and the city of Jikargunggar, and receives the Galjao-mooren; further on, proceeding towards the south, it traverses a country inhabited by unsubdued hordes, and enters Yun-nan near the ancient city Yung-chow; it there bears the name of Pin-lang-keang. It quits this province at the fort of Teih-pih-kwan, and enters the kingdom of Mëen-tëen."

We have given a translation of this extract in full, because it is so abundant in facts; as the system of orthography employed by Mr. Klaproth differs from our own, and as he does not give the original characters, we are not sure we have accurately written all the names.

Mr. Klaproth then quotes an assertion of Major Rennel, that the Irawaddy is navigable from Yun-nan to Ava; observing that it is fully supported by the data in the edict. He next gives an extract from the great imperial geography of China, shewing that the inferior course of the Dzangbo from Tibet, or of the Irawaddy from Ava, was long known by the Chinese, who called it Takin-sha-keang. The details given by the Chinese writers are too long to be given entire, and are not susceptible of abridgment. The editors of the Chinese work distinctly declare that there is no doubt that the great Kin-sha-keang and the Yarou-dzangbo of Tibet are identical.

A few remarks upon the geographical features of the country, through which the great rivers of Tibet pass, follow this extract. Mr. Klaproth then points out sundry grievous errors in the longitude of places in the map of the Jesuits, which are situated considerably more to the westward than their real position, which errors increase in proportion to the distance from the meridian of Peking; and he fairly concludes that similar errors might be discovered in other parts of it. In fact, in the new map of the Chinese empire, the position of several places is given a degree more to the eastward than in the maps of Kang-he's time.

Our author next gives a narrative of the more recent English surveys of the upper portion of the Brahmaputra, by Capt. Bedford, Lieut. Wilcox, and Lieut. Burlton, which were published in this journal;* and he justly considers that these accounts plainly demonstrate that this river has no connexion with the great stream of Tibet. He then refers to the latest discoveries of Messrs. Wilcox and Burlton † regarding the sources of the Irawaddy, as they allege; but which, Mr. Klaproth states, are those of the Seerce-serhit, a river peculiar to the kingdom of Ava. "It traverses the Samsuk or Semsuk country, passes the city of Payen-dewn, and above Bhanmo joins the Pin-lang-keang, or great Kin-sha-keang, here called Bhanmo-keang, which flows from Yun-nan, and which is the Yarou-dzangbo-tchou of Tibet. These two rivers united form what is called the Irawaddy. At the same time, it is not impossible," he observes, "that the Burmans may give the name of Irawaddy to the Seerce-serhit: just as the Chinese take the Min-keang of Sze-chuen for the commencement of the great Keane.

* See vol. xxm. pp. 495 et seq. and vol. xxiv. pp. 307, 430.

keang is merely one of its branches."

With respect to the remark of the editor of the Calcutta Gazette, in recording this discovery, that "the hypothesis of Klaproth, notwithstanding the arrogant confidence with which it has been given to the public, is wholly overturned by the results of this journey;"* our author says: "begging the Calcutta journalists' pardon, this journey demonstrates nothing repugnant to the facts which I have detailed, and it will be seen by the map appended to this memoir, that the discovery of the sources of the Secree-scrit does not militate against the Yarou-dzangbo-tchou's entering first China and then Ava where it becomes the Irawaddy of the geographers, which passes Amerapoora. though the Burmans may take the Secree-scrhit for the beginning of the great river, which is one of the chief causes of the prosperity of their country." He concludes as follows:

With regard to the Yarou-dzangbo-tchou, or true Irawaddy, it appears to be the same river which is called Sri-Lohit by the mountaineers of Assam, + and which, according to the tradition of the country, was crossed by the two brothers Khanlac and Khantae, t founders of the two families of princes who reigned in Assam. Tradition makes these brothers come from heaven; but there is every reason to believe they were originally of Tibet; and then, in order to reach Assam, they were naturally forced to cross the great river which passes through Tibet.

In my map, I have endeavoured to represent, as far as practicable, all the recent discoveries relative to the Brahmaputra and the Irawaddy; but in order to form a perfeetly correct idea of them, it is necessary to wait for the complete narratives of the English travellers, who have with so much zeal contributed to augment our knowledge in regard to a point so interesting to physical geography.

Finally, I ought to observe, that the result of their discoveries was long ago foreseen by Mexander Dalrymple, one of the greatest geographers of modern times. His Essay towards a Map of the Burmese Empire, inserted in the narrative of Captain Symes' Journey to the Court of Ava, shews the upper part of this river just as it really exists, according to the accounts recently collected by the English travellers. It is inconceivable that the countrymen of this illustrious geographer should appear to have totally forgotten this fact; for in all they have published of late regarding the sources of the Brahmaputra, the name of Dalrymple is never once mentioned. In the same map, Dalrymple also places the river of Tibet in relation with the eastern branch of the great river which in Ava bears the name of the Irawaddy; but not being aware of the facts stated in the Chinese books, he does not make the Yarou-dzangbo pass through the most eastern point of Yun-nan.

In comparing Mr. Klaproth's translations of the reports published in the Calcutta Gazette with the originals, we find some reason to think that his knowledge of the English language is not unexceptionable; and as he has spoken with some contempt of the writer in the Gazette for criticising works written in a language which he does not perfectly comprehend, he cannot think it unfair if, in reviewing his reply, we should point out his own defects in this particular. Passing over occasional verbal errors of little moment, the two following instances of mistranslation appear important. The period of the Burman invasion governed Asam."

• Our author adds in a note: " the learned editors of the Allgemeine Geographische Ephemeriden of Weimar have repeated all these pawretes. They must be excused; the horizon of people with narrow views is extremely limited!"

† See Asiat. Journ. vol. xxiii. p.499. The passage referred to by Mr. Klaproth is as follows: "the Sri Lohit is said to have been crossed by the posterity of Khunling and Khunlae, the heaven-descended founders of the family, which to the

The editor of the Gazette, in one of the articles to which we have referred, states as follows:

A portion of the river was now entered, running east from Sadiya, which is yet a  $_{\rm blank}$  upon the latest maps.

This Mr. Klaproth translates thus:

Puis l'on entra dans une partie de la rivière qui vient de Seddiya, situé à l'est, et qui n'est pas encore marqué sur les cartes les plus récentes.

Hence, it appears that he has misunderstood the passage. If the river runs cust from Sadiya, that place must be situated, in relation to it, to the west, not to the cast. At any rate the passage is not faithfully rendered.

A still more material variation occurs where Mr. Klaproth confounds two distinct branches of the Brahmaputra, the Dihong and the Dibong. The editor of the Calcutta Gazette (November 2, 1326) observed:

The sources of other principal branches of the Lohit or Brahmaputra Proper, as well as of the great southern portion, the Bor Dehing, are, however, still undetermined. Of the latter, nothing has yet been published; of the former, some additional information has been obtained, but it requires verification. The sources of the Dihong are apparently not far from the frontiers of the Lama's country, as the Meesmees, situated on the former, carry on an active traffic with the latter. Of a more important branch, the Dibong, the Bor Abors confidently assert, that it flows from the west, and that a lake, through which, or from which, it issues, gives rise to the Soobunsheeree also. The description, however, seems to be rather incompatible with the assertion that in the north-westerly route to the Lama's territory the Dibong is crossed from east to west at the twelfth stage, and then left.

Mr. Klaproth's translation thus represents the passage:

The sources of the other principal branches of the Lohit or Brahmaputra Proper, as well as of its great southern portion, the Boree Dehing, still remain undetermined. Nothing has yet been published upon the latter; some new information has been obtained upon the former, but it requires verification. It appears that the sources of the Dihong are not far from the frontiers of the Lama's country, as the Meesmees in its vicinity, carry on an active commerce with the latter. The Bor Abors assert, respecting the Dihong, that it is considerable, that it flows from the west, and that a lake which it traverses, or whence it issues, gives rise also to the Soobunsheeree. But these details seem incompatible with the assertion that the route from the north-west, which leads to the territory of the Lamas, crosses the Dihong from east to west at the twelfth stage, and then diverges therefrom.

Here again, Mr. Klaproth has totally misapprehended the writer's meaning, or he has taken great pains to pervert the sense of the passage. The Dihong and the Dibong, so far as we recollect their relative positions, are two streams falling into the Bor Lohit nearly at the same place, but from different points, the former somewhat to the westward of north, the latter considerably to the eastward. Later reports upon the subject seem to regard these two streams as branches of one river, the eastern and western Dihong; but it is obvious that the editor of the Gazette, in the passage quoted, spoke of them distinctly.

Mr. Klaproth has not favoured us with a copy of the map intended to accompany his memoir, which would have made his notions much clearer to us.

De Musei Sprewitziani Mosquæ Numis Kuficis nonnullis antehac ineditis, qui Chersonesi humo eruti esse dicuntur, Commentationes duæ, plura eædem ut Numismaticæ ita Geographiæ et Historiæ Asiaticæ capita obscuriora illustrantes. Scripsit Dr. C. M. Fræhn. Petersburgh, 1825. 4to. pp, 110.

Dr. Sprewitz's valuable cabinet of oriental coins at Moscow has a most able expositor of its treasures in Dr. Fræhn, whose qualifications as a numismatical critic is well established. The present work adds not a little to his reputation in this department of science; it displays much shrewdness of conjecture, as well as learning and research.

There is no country, as Dr. Fræhn observes, so capable of extending the limits of oriental numismatics, and aiding the study of this branch of learning. as Russia. Most other countries of Europe have to gather from remote parts. and at a great expense, the scattered pieces requisite to form a collection of coins, which Russia can obtain in a short time, and at little cost. Not only are opportunities for this object presented to her through the connexion of her vast southern frontier with various eastern states, such as Turkey, Persia. Bucharia, China, with which she maintains political and commercial relations: but, like three other kingdoms of Europe, Spain, Portugal, and Sicily, Russia once saw the throne of an Asiatic dynasty established in its territory. The Asiatic princes who ruled Russia from the beginning of the thirteenth to the middle of the fifteenth century, however short their reigns, were studious of coining money; hence its very soil furnished those imperishable and accurate historical records in profusion. Nor are they found unmixed with other coins of kindred dynasties in adjoining countries, such as those of Iran and Jagatai, though less in number. Besides these, coins of more remote date, belonging to the Omniade and Abasside Caliphs, as well as of the Taher, Saman and Buweih Emirs, are found, often in great numbers, in the eastern and southern provinces.

Notwithstanding the soil of Russia thus supplies an inexhaustible store of Mohammedan coins, this sort of treasure, Dr. Fræhn remarks, has long been neglected and despised by its inhabitants. The quantity of oriental coins dug up in the Russian territory must, in the course of so many years, have been prodigious: unhappily, the greater portion of them has been melted down; and if, by good fortune, some escaped this fate, and were preserved, they remained, generally speaking, concealed, unexplained, and condemned to oblivion. There was a want of oriental scholars in the country, who, by expounding their legends, and showing their connexion with history, might add to the value of these relies. The aspect of things has, however, at length changed; and these coins are now sought with avidity, though the number dug up is now greatly diminished, and is diminishing every year.

The work before us consists of two dissertations, one relating to certain coins of Caliphs of the dynasties of Ommiyah and Abbas, beginning with the date A.H. 110; the other comprehending the coins of the Emirs, commencing with those of Ibrahim I., A.H. 187.

A coin of Mutewckkil, one of the Abassides, in A.H. 239, is ingeniously employed by Dr. Fræhn to remedy a defect in the Arabian historians. The others included in the first dissertation, though rare, present nothing besides very remarkable.

The

The second dissertation contains some curious particulars. On a coin of Ibrahim I. of the Aglebidian Emirs, A.H. 187, Dr. Fræhn reads, or thinks افريقية The words . بافريقية سنة سبع وڠنين (و) صية The words . Afrikia, is not, indeed, clearly visible, but he says, as far as he can make out, in tenuissimis et obscuris litterarum ductibus, no other word can be read. " Afrikia, however, is a name by which the Arabs are not only accustomed to distinguish that portion of northern Africa which now comprehends Tunis and Tripoli, but also to designate the chief city of that province of the empire." Dr. Fræhn is of opinion that the place referred to in this coin is the city of Cairovan, founded by Oukaba, the invader of Africa, about A.H. 50, and supposed by geographers to have been built upon the ruins of the ancient Cyrene. That city was long the metropolis of Arabian Africa; and although no Arab writer has stated that Cairovan ever was called Afrikia on the coins of this period, yet it is not apparent what other city could have had such an appellation. The reading of the word Afrikia is supported by the name of Ibrahim, who is identified with the son of Agleb, who in A. II. 184 was appointed governor of Africa by Harun, and afterwards became the founder of the Aglebidian dynasty. At the period when the coins was struck, he had not obtained the privileges of the kutha and the sicca, as the piece testifies, which sacred honours he, at length, like the other Emirs, usurped.

Dr. Fræhn subjoins a list of the Aglebidian coins, which are very rare, with the names of the princes to whom they ought to be attributed.

The coins of the Taheridian Emirs are the next treated of; and Dr. Fræhn explains at length the reasons why he and others thought it right that certain coins of this class should be considered as belonging to the Caliphs, the names of the princes, who ordered them to be struck being omitted, or the names of the Caliphs or of their sons only being inserted.

In describing a coin of Taher II., who succeeded his father Abdallah as Emir, A. H. 230, and died in 248, Dr. Fræhn gives a curious disquisition upon the subject of the changes in names and places in Mohammedan records, and particularly respecting the place called Muhammedia, in which the coin referred to professes to be struck.

The obscurity which prevails as to places is not the least of the difficulties with which the science of oriental numismatics is beset. Cufic coins bear the names of places unknown to Arabian writers, or the memory of which had long perished before their time, or the early names of which had given place to others in common use. Of the latter kind is the name of the city called Muhammedia.

This name, which, as Dr. Fræhn observes, properly denotes a city founded by Mohammed, occurs on many coins of the Caliphs, especially the early Abassides. As such a city seems to have existed in several places, it was not apparent which city was meant when referred to upon Cufic coins. Kehr, the father of Cufic numismatics, was the first who discovered the name upon a coin of Mamoun, A.H. 193 (erroneously attributed to Ameen), and upon another of Ameen, A.H. 195. He determined the Muhammedia on the first to be a city in the Persian province of Kerman. But Reiske shewed satisfactorily that the city alluded to in Kerman did not acquire the name of Muhammedia till the reign of the Caliph Mutewekkil, A.H. 232—247, its prior name being Dehir-abi-'l-Sacra. Where it was situated does not appear, leiske was of opinion that the Muhammedia, where the two pieces in question were coined, was "some palace at Bagdad," so named from Ameen, otherwise Mohammed, a conjecture unsupported by authority. Tychsen thought the name might have been applied to some part of Bagdad, from the Caliph Mahdi also called Mohammed. Adler, however, though he thought both conjectures probable, suspected that Muhammedia might have been a place in Kho. rasan. The supposition that Muhammedia was a palace or district in Bagdad was countenanced by Baron de Sacy (who was inclined to think, from a passage in Makrizi, that Bagdad itself was called Muhammedia), by Conde. Mæller, Hallenberg, Castiglioni, and Schiepati. Recently, however, adds Dr. Fræhn, Mr. Marsden * has shaken, though not altogether dissipated, this vulgar error. Although Dr. Fræhn agrees with Mr. Marsden, that Muhammedia is not to be sought for in Bagdad, he excepts to the testimony upon which this opinion is founded-namely, his reading of the legend on the two coins referred to below. On one of them Mr. Marsden reads " Medinet-cl. Salam, A.H. 168;" whereas Dr. Fræhn reads " in Kasr-el-Salam, A.H. 161:" on the other Mr. Marsden reads, "in cl-Muhammediah," which Dr. Fræhn thinks is "in el-Basra," Moreover, he censures Mr. Marsden for having expressed so vague and light a conjecture (conjectura vaga illa et levis) respecting the situation of Muhammedia, when he had before him a work of Dr. Fræhn's,† wherein this obscure point was cleared up, and the Muhammedia of these coins was asserted to be الري cl Rey, or Rac, a city in Persian Irak, once considerable, but now in ruins.

At the time when the treatise quoted below was written, Dr. Fræhn had not access to certain works, which he has since consulted, and he quotes what certainly appears irrefragable evidence in support of his hypothesis. A very considerable portion of the second dissertation is devoted to an investigation of this curious point, and we recommend this part of Dr. Fræhn's work in particular to the attention of Mr. Marsden, than whom no person is better qualified to judge of its merits.

• &quot;A difference of opinion prevails with respect to the place to which the name of Muhammedian belonged. The most common supposition attributes it to a particular division or suburb of the greatly of Baghdad; but the coincidence of date between this and the coin last described (i. e. xxxi. and xxxii.) affords a presumption of the contrary almost amounting to proof; for it cannot, without the most direct evidence, be admitted, that two coins of the same denomination should in the same year be struck by the same prince, in two districts of his capital, under distinct names. The site of Muhammediah must, therefore, be looked for elsewhere; but it will probably be found at no great distance from the seat of government."—Numismata Orientalia Illustrata, vol. i. p. 38.

† Das Muhammedanische Münzkabinet, des Asiat. Museums zu Petersburg. 1021.

Royal Asiatic Society of Great Britain and Freland.

March 1st. The general meeting of the Society was held this day at 2 o'clock r.m.; Sir George Thomas Staunton, Bart., vice-president, in the chair.

The following donations were presented:

From Radhacant Deb, vice-president of the Calcutta Agricultural Society, a copy of the first part of his work entitled Sabda Calpa Druma, and a Bengalee spellingbook. This donation was accompanied by a letter from the author, and an explanation in English of the plan of the first-named work, which is a Sanscrit lexicon; the words are collected from all the dictionaries procurable in Bengal, as well as from various MSS. They are arranged, together with the roots, in alphabetical order; the genders of the words, the indicators of the roots, their various significations and figurative meanings, are given; and after the explanation of any known word, its meaning in Bengalee, and synonimous terms, are placed. In addition to this, all terms of science are explained after the manner of an European Encyclopædia; the authorities for every word, or in case these are not known, their etymology, is given; and a short Sanscrit grammar and preface will be annexed when the work is completed. The Bengalee spellingbook is stated to be upon the plan of that published in English by the late Lindley Murray. The letter (which was read to the meeting) was in reply to the circular of the Committee of Correspondence of the Society; and the writer, after remarking upon the present low state of the arts in India, states his conviction of the beneficial effects arising from the association of learned men for the promotion of science and literature, to the countries in which they are established; which benefits become universal when such societies interchange their ideas with similar institutions in foreign countries: and he concludes his letter with an expression of his opinion, that not only the English term "hour," the Greek Lea, and the Latin "hora," but also the European division of the day and night into twenty-four hours from midnight to midnight, is of Sanscrit origin, and in support of this opinion quotes an extract from the Agni Purana, of which passage he states the purport to be, that thirty muhurtas are equal to a day and a night, which two are comprised in twenty-four belás or horás, and that the computation of a day and a night by thirty muhúrtas is from sunrise to sunrise, and that by twenty-four belás or horás, from midnight to midnight.

The reading of this letter excited considerable interest among the members present, and several gentlemen expressed a wish that some more striking and public mark of the Society's approbation of the works of this learned native than the ordinary thanks of the meeting should be conferred upon him; but as the transaction of the usual business of the general meetings does not admit of any discussion, no resolution was come to upon the subject. We understand, however, that the Council have directed the presentation of a copy of the Society's Transactions to Radhacant Deb, in testimony of the Society's estimation of his labours; and intend proposing him to the Society for election as a cortesponding member.

In addition to this donation the following were laid before the meeting, viz. from the Cambridge Philosophical Society, the first and second volumes of that Society's Transactions.

From Professor Bopp, F.M. R. A.S., his Sanscrit grammar, in German.

From the Rev. Dr. Morrison, M.R.A.S., a copy of the Fifth Report of the Anglo-Chinese College at Malacca.

From M. Grangeret de la Grange, his Authologie Arabe.

From the Directors of the London Oriental Institution, a copy of their new Persian Grammar.

From Colonel Hugh Stacy Osborne, several specimens of Malayalim MSS, on toco-nut leaves; among them are two original letters from the Cotiote Rajab, bearing Assatic Journ. Vor. 25. No.148.

3 R

his own signature; one of these documents is addressed to the inhabitants of Ettacoornaad in Wynaad, upbraiding them for patiently submitting to the entrance of the English army, and urging them, in the name of Perumal and all the gods, to assist him in taking revenge; in case of refusal, threatening them with his vengeance. The other is to one of his chieftains, stating the arrival of intelligence of the intention of the English army to enter his country at a particular quarter, and ordering him to proceed with his forces to oppose its progress: the date of this latter document is November 28th, 1796.

Colonel Osborne likewise presented a model (in bamboo) of a Chincse passage boat, and a model of the lusus nature, which was in existence and exhibited at Macao, about six years since. An account of this extraordinary person* was furnished by Mr. Livingstone, surgeon to the British factory at Canton, and printed in the Asiatic Journal, vol. xii. p. 57.

William Marsden, Esq., M. R. A.S., presented several MS. firmans, &c. from the Emperor Akbar to the Jesuit missionaries.

The thanks of the Society were voted to the respective donors.

Solomon Peile, jun., Esq. was elected a resident member of the Society.

Dr. Colin Rogers, elected on the 2d, and P. J. Salomons, Esq., elected on the 16th of February last, having made their payments and signed the obligation-book, were admitted members of the Society.

The reading of Dr. B. Hamilton's History of the Hindu kingdom of Kamrup was concluded, and thanks returned to the author for its communication.

The history of the district of Rungopur, nearly the whole of which is comprised in the ancient Hindu kingdom of Kamrup, is involved in great obscurity. One of the earliest traditions respecting it is, that Norok, son of the earth, being a great favourite with Crishna, was presented by that deity with the country of Kamrup (region of desire), and constituted guardian of the temple of Kamakhya (granter of pleasure), the presiding deity of that region; this deity is considered as female, and her temple is still much frequented. Norok being a worshipper of Siva, and a great oppressor, lost the favour of Crishna, and was put to death. Bhogodotto, his son, succeeded hin, and fell on the vanquished side in the war which placed Yudishthr on the throne of India: it is considered probable that this prince is the Bhugrut mentioned in Gladwin's translation of the Ayeen Akbery.

The author does not think that, after making every allowance for the duration of the sovereignty of the family of Yudishthir and the succeeding dynasties, the era of the former can be placed much beyond the time of Augustus.

It does not appear that any part of the district was comprehended in the Hindu kingdom of Bengal during the dynasty of Adisur, but was governed by a family of princes, of whom Dherma Pal is the first who has left any traces behind. He had a brother who died early, and left the management of his estates and son to his widow.
Dherma Pal was subsequently killed in battle: he was succeeded by his nephew, who at first indulged in sensual pleasures and the luxury of 100 wives; he afterwards wished to take the government into his own hands, but his mother had the address to persuade him to dedicate his life to religion, and he is supposed to be now wandering in the forests as a religious mendicant.

The conduct of the third king of the next dynasty afforded an opportunity to the Mahomedans of conquering the country. It is said, though this is probably an exaggeration, that the siege of the chief city occupied twelve years, and was at last taken by treachery.

Those parts of Kamrup which were not occupied by the Mahomedans, were overrun • The lusus nature referred to was a man named A-ke, who was born about twenty-four years ago, in a district ninety-seven miles S.W. of Canton, with another male child, nearly the same size, united to the pit of his stomach by the neck. A-ke grew to the height of about four feet ten inches, but his brother (as it was termed) continued the original size.

by various rude tribes, of which the most powerful was the Koch; who, though at first separated under several chieftains, at last united under Hajo. This prince had two daughters, who had each a son. One of these succeeded to the whole power of his grandfather, and it was then discovered that he had the honour of being descended from the god Siva, and in this honour his cousin afterwards claimed to share. When this raia died, he divided his dominions between his two sons. At the time the Ayeen Akbery was written, this division of territory was not known at Delhi, but it was shortly afterwards discovered, and then the Mahomedan governor of Dhaka became urgent for the payment of tribute from Raja Porekhyit, who governed the most considerable portion. As the Raja did not dare openly to refuse, but wished to obtain more favourable terms, he went to Agra, and the King gave him an order directing the governor to receive as tribute whatever sum the Raja chose to offer. So strangely ignorant was the Raja of the value of money, that he offered the immense sum of twenty millions of rupees, which was of course accepted, and he returned with great self-satisfaction. When, however, his minister explained the error into which he had fallen, he was thrown into the greatest consternation, and unfortunately died before this mistake could be rec-The Mahomedans took possession of the country in default of the payment of tribute, and the late Raja's brother, who had governed the smallest portion of territory, together with the minister of that unfortunate prince, were allowed large estates by the Mahomedans for their support. The sway of the Moslems, in its turn, sunk before the British power. The paper is concluded with a notice of the present political state of the country.

The reading of Capt. Grant's journal of a route through Makran was concluded, and thanks returned to Colonel Worsley, by whom it was communicated.

It was then announced that the anniversary meeting would be acld on Saturday the 15th, at one o'clock.

March 15th. The Society met this day to celebrate the fifth anniversary of its institution.

The meeting was numerously attended, and the chair was taken at one o'clock precisely by the president, the Right Hon. Charles W. Williams Wynn, supported by Sir A. Johnston and Sir G. T. Staunton, two of the vice-presidents. Their Excellencies Count Ludolf, Neapolitan ambassador, and M. de Falck, ambassador from the Netherlands, also honoured the Society with their attendance.

The proceedings of the day were commenced by the Secretary reading the Council's report of the Society's proceedings during the past year.

The report is in substance as follows:-

"The Council of the Royal Asiatic Society feel much satisfaction in being able to commence their report by remarking that the Society's numerical strength has increased during the past year, notwithstanding the loss of several valuable members by death, among whom are the Right Hon. G. Canning, the Earl of Guildford, and Mr. Daniel Moore.

"The death of Mr. Canning has been so universally felt and regretted, that the Council, in recording their deep concern at this public calamity, do but repeat sentiments which have been expressed by all classes throughout the British empire.

"To Mr. D. Moore, your late solicitor, a tribute of gratitude is due, not only for the professional services which he gratuitously rendered to the Society, but also for his liberal contribution to your funds, as well as to those of several other institutions for the advancement of knowledge. In the Earl of Guildford also, the literary world in general, and especially this Society, must must feel that they have lost a liberal patron and a zealous promoter of learning.

"From this painful subject the Council would willingly turn and draw the attention of the meeting to the numerous and valuable donations which have been made to the Society since the last annual meeting.

"Foremost among these must be placed the munificent donation, by the Court of Directors of the Hon. East-India Company, of 100 guineas, which, with the characteristic liberality of that body, the Honourable Court has announced its intention annually to renew."

An enumeration of the societies and individuals who have presented either books or objects of curiosity to the Society during the preceding year was then read, after which the report proceeds:

"Although the grateful acknowledgments of the Society are due to all who thus appear in the list of its benefactors, they are more especially merited by some, whom the Council therefore think it right to point out.

"His Imperial Majesty the Emperor of Russia has presented through his ambassador a Comparative Dictionary of all Languages, and a collection of vocabularies compiled by Pallas, and other eminently learned men, under the immediate superintendence of the Empress Catherine.

"Mons. de Falck, ambassador from the King of the Netherlands, has presented a French and Dutch translation of Mr. Marsden's Malayan Dictionary and Grammar. The works upon which such an unprecedented honour has been conferred, as well as all Mr. Marsden's other publications, have been presented to the Society by their learned author.

"The distinguished President of your Society has put in your possession a large collection of the papers relating to the East-Indies, that have been printed by order of the Houses of Parliament.

"To Sir John Malcolm the Society is indebted not only for the presentation of an extensive and valuable collection of Persian MSS., but also for having placed in the Society's museum a highly interesting collection of Asiatic arms, Hindu sculptures, Egyptian antiquities, and Persian paintings.

"In addition to the liberal donations presented in preceding years by Sir Alexander Johnston, one of your Vice-Presidents, that gentleman has conferred additional obligations on the Society by the gift of some curiosities and several valuable MSS, connected with Singhalese literature. Among the latter, an inscription found near Trincomalee was considered so interesting from its traditional connexion with the ancient history of Ceylon, that the Council has deemed it expedient to have it lithographed and circulated, in the hope that it may be decyphered.

"The Council is happy to announce that the foundation of a collection of natural history has been laid by Sir Robert Colquhoun's presentation of many beautiful specimens of birds, insects, and quadrupeds, collected by that gentleman in the Malayan peninsula; while from Lieut. Col. Farquhar, late governor of Malacca, the Society has received a splendid collection of drawings of the animal and vegetable kingdoms, as existing within the precincts of his government.

"Lieut. Colonel Hopkinson, C.B., has largely contributed to the Society's museum by the donation of a very interesting collection of curiosities from Ava.

"Mr. J. Hodgson has presented several MSS, which will probably furnish materials for papers in future volumes of your Transactions, and the museum will ere long be enriched with a large and elaborate model of a Hindu pagoda now at Madras, but lately given by that gentleman to this Society.

"The

"The splendid collection of curiosities from the Birman empire, which must have excited the admiration of every person who has visited the museum, has been obligingly deposited there by Captain Marryat, to whom the Society is therefore under much obligation.

"The Council have felt anxious that these offerings so liberally bestowed on the Society should not only be preserved, but also advantageously exhibited, so that their possession might be rendered a source of instruction and amusement. With this view the collection of arms has been cleaned and arranged for display. The specimens of natural history have been stuffed and set out for inspection, and additional glazed cases have been procured for such objects as were liable to injury from exposure. The Council conceive this to be the best return the Society can make to those who have so kindly added to its stores, and the most probable means of inducing others to imitate their example. As connected with this part of the report, the Council would recal to the attention of members that cards of admission to the museum have been printed, which may be procured on application at the Society's house, by which means the inconvenience to members of personally introducing strangers is obviated."

A scries of abstracts of the papers which have been read before the general meetings of the Society, since the last anniversary, was here introduced; but as the whole of them have been noticed in the monthly reports of the Society's proceedings printed in this Journal, it is unnecessary to repeat them. The Council report then continues as follows:

"Such are the communications which have occupied the attention of your general meetings during the year just terminated. The greater part of those read during the preceding year are printed in the third part of the Society's Transactions, which completes the first volume. The Council indulge the hope that this volume will not be considered unworthy of the Society, and that these first-fruits of their labours will be viewed as the promise of a rich and abundant harvest in the extensive field of oriental literature. The list of donations in the Appendix to the Transactions, affords a gratifying proof of the interest which many of the members have taken in the Society's welfare. In relation to the library, to which that list records so many contributions, the Council deem it proper to mention, that as they consider the Society to be essentially oriental, they have provided for the purchase of all such new and interesting works relating to Asia as are not presented by their authors, and have also directed the regular supply of the newspapers printed at the Indian presidencies. To enable them to meet the increased expenditure thus incurred, they have countermanded those periodical publications which are not principally devoted to oriental literature. This measure has been adopted with the less reluctance, from its having been observed that those works were scarcely ever read at the Society's house, probably in consequence of the means most of the members possess of consulting them in other places.

"The appointment of new governors to the Indian presidencies offering an excellent opportunity for extending the Society's connexions in India, the Council appointed deputations to wait upon Lord William Bentinck, the Right Hon. S. R. Lushington, and Sir John Malcolm, the newly appointed governors, who received them with the utmost cordiality, and gave the most friendly assurances of assistance. Suggestions of the means whereby the Society's interests could be best promoted in their respective governments were in consequence furnished to those gentlemen, who kindly promised their endeavours to carry them into execution.

"From the co-operation of these distinguished individuals the Council feel warranted in anticipating the most beneficial results.

"Every member of the Society having been furnished with the prospectus of the Oriental Translation Committee, the Council consider it unnecessary to do more on this occasion than to state, that the object of the Committee is to publish translations of Oriental works free of expense to the translators. The august patronage with which this plan is honoured, the liberal subscriptions by which it is supported, and the qualifications of the committee to which its execution is entrusted, afford well-grounded hopes that this important undertaking will greatly advance our knowledge of the East, and prove highly creditable to British orientalists.

"The Council cannot close this report without expressing their conviction, that the most efficient mode of promoting the honour and prosperity of the Society is the communication of a varied and abundant supply of interesting original papers for publication in your Transactions. In reference to this object a collection of desiderata and inquiries* has been circulated, and the Council hope that they will induce many who possess valuable information on the subjects proposed, to communicate it to the Society.

"In conclusion, the Council feel very sincere pleasure in declaring their opinion that the prosperity which has attended the Society during the past year, and the favourable prospects offered by that which is commencing, furnish subjects of the most cordial congratulation to this meeting, and to the members in general."

The reading of the Council report being concluded, the auditors stated the result of their examination of the Treasurer's accounts; the heads of this report are as follow:

| Receipts from December 31, 1826 to the same day $1827 \dots$ .  Disbursements for the same period, including a loan of £120                                                                   | £1,194 | 12 | 0 |
|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|--------|----|---|
| for payment for a bust of the late Secretary                                                                                                                                                  | 1,288  | 0  | 0 |
| Cash balance against the Society, December 31, 1827                                                                                                                                           | £93    | 8  | 0 |
| But as the loan of £120 above-mentioned will be repaid, it is right to state, that had this sum remained in the Treasurer's hands, there would have been a balance in the Society's favour of | £26    | 12 | 0 |
| The second statement brought forward exhibited the receipts                                                                                                                                   |        |    | _ |
| from December 31, 1827, to March 15, 1828, at                                                                                                                                                 | £702   | 6  | 0 |
| And the disbursements for the same period, at                                                                                                                                                 | €85    | 1  | 0 |
| Leaving a cash balance in the Treasurer's hands this day, of                                                                                                                                  | £17    | 5  | 0 |

Besides a remittance of £21 not yet due, and the £120 before-mentioned. The next statement referred to was that of the actual assets of the Society at the present time, from which it appeared that their total amount is about £3,300.

The total amount of arrears of every description now owing to the Society was stated at £854. 13s. It should be understood that this sum not only includes compositions, &c. due from non-resident members, but also the whole of the subscriptions now due for the current year, and consequently the receipt of a very considerable portion of them may be confidently reckoned upon in the course of the year.

The amount of receipts for the ensuing year, which may be considered certain, tain, is £916.7s., and to this sum may very probably be added a further sum of £938.7s. arising from items specified in the report, making a total sum (including contingencies) of £1,854.14s.

The total probable amount of the expenditure for the year, including an allowance for contingencies, is estimated at £1,217.3s. 6d.; and therefore, should these estimates prove nearly correct, there may be a balance in the Treasurer's hands at the close of the year of from £500 to £600.

In remarking upon this last statement, the auditors observed, that a very considerable portion of the certain annual expense arose from the charges attendant upon the Society's house; and that the Society could not hope to be relieved from them except by the grant of a site for building on, or accommodation in some one of the government offices. The report concludes with a complimentary reference to the zeal and attention manifested by the Treasurer in the discharge of the duties belonging to his department.

The auditors having finished their report, the President called upon Sir Alexander Johnston, as Chairman of the Committee of Correspondence of the Society, to furnish a statement of the proceedings of that Committee since its institution: upon which that gentleman rose, and after apologizing for not being prepared with a written report, he proceeded to state, first, what had been done by the Committee with respect to Europe, and secondly, with reference to Asia. The first Society with which it had opened communications at home, was the London Mechanics' Institute, through its president, Dr. Rirkbeck: the object of this connexion was to obtain a comparative view of the state of the arts in India, as illustrated by models, &c. now in England, contrasted with the machines of Europe, for the purpose of ascertaining the probable benefit which would arise from the introduction of the more perfect specimens of European ingenuity into use in India, in place of the many awkward and cumbrous utensils now employed in that country. Communications were next opened with the Medico-Botanical Society, of which the director, Mr. Frost, is a member of the Royal Asiatic Society. One of the principal objects of the Medico-Botanical Society is to qualify medical officers proceeding on foreign service, for furnishing information upon the nature and uses of plants. This Society has offered to further the ends of the Royal Asiatic Society by all the means in its power, and its director has been appointed to conduct the correspondence of the Committee upon botanical subjects. The Committee next directed its attention to the Royal Institution. and from the professor of chemistry there, Mr. Faraday, received assurances of his willingness to assist in promoting the Society's objects whenever it is in his power. Applications were made to the two Universities for their cooperation and assistance, which were most readily promised; and the Oriental Translation Committee was given to understand that the use of the Clarendon press would be open to it upon all suitable occasions. Sir Alexander here complimented Mr. Peel for the zeal and cordiality with which he entered into the views of the Committee relative to procuring the assistance of the Universities, and then proceeded to recapitulate the steps taken to induce the East-India Company to lend its aid in furtherance of the Society's designs, and which led to the annual grant of £105 from the Court of Directors. Sir Alexander expatiated upon the importance and value of this public mark of the interest felt in the Society by that body, as by their means, and under their sanction, the objects of the Society could be made known in all the vast territories under their rule, in the most effectual manner. He next adverted to the marked manner in which his Royal Highness the Duke of Clarence, one of the Society's Vice-Patrens, had displayed his wishes for its success; and particularly with reference to the Oriental Translation Committee, whose objects his Royal Highness warmly patronized, and assisted by a liberal annual contribution. On Lieut. Col. Fitzclarence, Sir Alexander passed a high eulogium, for the activity and perseverance with which he had forwarded the plan of this Committee, and by his exertions obtained the majority of the brilliant list of subscriptions which appears in the prospectus.

Having thus reported what had been done by the Committee in England, Sir A. Johnston proceeded to state the means employed for establishing connexions with various parts of Asia. The appointment of new governors to the three presidencies presented the most favourable opportunity for carrying the wishes of the Committee into effect, and accordingly deputations were nominated to wait upon each of those gentlemen, in order to explain the views of the Committee. These several deputations were received with the greatest cordiality by the governors, who professed their willingness to aid the Committee's objects by every means in their power, and suggestions of the methods by which their influence might be most successfully exerted in its favour were subsequently furnished to those gentlemen by the Committee. It was understood, in particular, that Lord William Bentinck would use his exertions for the purpose of procuring an accurate and comprehensive account of the Burmese empire, and especially of the religion of that extensive country; and, with reference to this last subject, application had also been made to Sir E. Barnes, governor of Cevlon, for the same purpose, as that island is the best place from whence exact and extensive information with respect to the religion of Buddha can be derived. Sir Alexander stated that when he was officially engaged in framing a system of government for the natives, founded upon their own laws and customs, he formed, in the course of his inquiries, a very large collection of their religious books, which were supplied to him by the chief priests of the island with the most unreserved confidence. The greatest part of this valuable collection was unfortunately lost in the vessel in which Sir Alexander had taken his passage home; but other copies are procurable in Cevlon, and the Society will no doubt be furnished with them through the interference of the Governor. Sir Alexander next alluded in laudatory terms to Radhacant Deb. whose donation and letter are mentioned in the report of the proceedings of the last general meeting; and to Capt. Low, of Penang, whose translation of a work upon Siamese law, and a MS. copy of the original, were recently communicated to the Society. Sir Alexander expressed his opinion, that the Society ought not to lose any opportunity of expressing its sentiments in favour of such individuals as those just named, and that it should afford every encouragement to the natives of India in their literary pursuits. Sir Alexander concluded his view of the Committee's labours in Asia, with an allusion to the desirableness of obtaining accurate information with respect to the civil and natural history, topography, &c. of the Mauritius, Madagascar, the Seychelles, and the Mahommedan settlements from the Red Sea to Mozambique on one side, and from Mocha to Russoul Gant on the other. Sir Alexander stated that a very excellent opportunity for acquiring this information, had offered, in the appointment of Sir Chas. Colville to the government of the Isle of France and its dependencies.

On the continent of Europe, the Committee first applied to Portugal, and there Count Funchal undertook to translate the papers in possession of that government relating to their early settlements in Asia. The present Lord Stuart de Rothsay also procured some valuable accounts of the early voyages of that nation nation to India, which are now in the Custom-house, and when cleared will he placed in the hands of the Committee. The court of Naples was the second, from whose abundant means information on Asiatic subjects was attempted to be drawn; and the ambassador of that government in London, Count Ludolf, entered fully into the wishes of the Committee, with respect to obtaining some notices of the stores of knowledge possessed by the Catholic Missionaries, sent in such numbers into Asia by the College de Propaganda Fide, of whom many have returned, and are stationed in various parts of Italy. From the high rank held by Russia in Oriental literature, the Committee naturally expected considerable aid from that country: nor was it disappointed. The Committee having applied, through his Excellency the Prince de Lieven, Russian ambassador in London, for a copy of the extraordinary work compiled under the personal superintendence of the Empress Catherine the Second, by Pallas and other learned men of her dominions, upon hints furnished by D'Alembert-namely, a collection of vocabularies of all languages of which specimens could be obtained; his Imperial Majesty the Emperor of Russia immediately directed the presentation of a copy to the Society, together with a copy of the Polyglot dictionary published at St. Petersburgh in 1791; and, in addition, was graciously pleased to direct that every facility should be given to the correspondence between the Committee and the universities and other public institutions connected with Oriental literature in his dominions. In the course of this part of his report, Sir Alexander alluded to the various learned men who had devoted themselves to the comparison of languages, as the senior Adelung (whose nephew is now director of the Oriental Institute at St. Petersburgh), Balbi, Humboldt, &c. &c. Holland next attracted the views of the Committee, and Sir Alexander here remarked that Holland was the first country which produced any considerable works in Oriental literature, and that more learned natives of that country, or at least persons in its employment, had exerted themselves in the acquisition of information upon Oriental subjects than of any other European nation. The Literary Society at Batavia was the first which published transactions in India, and the labours of Rumphius and other natives of Holland were adduced in support of this assertion. Sir Alexander took occasion, in this place, to pay a brilliant compliment to the memory of the late M. Falck, who was governor of Ceylon, while that island was under the dominion of Holland, for twenty years, and whose conduct while in that situation was such as to endear him both to the Europeans and natives who were under his government, and to cause his character to be held up in the island as a model of justice and integrity.

Lastly, Sir Alexander noticed the cordial manner in which the Asiatic Society of Paris had assisted this Society, in every instance where its influence and operation had been required; and particularly mentioned the warm interest taken by that Society and its illustrious president, the Duke of Orleans, in the success of Messrs, Daniell's proposed publication, the Illustrations of India, for the furtherance of which project a Committee had been appointed to draw up a report upon the subject; and their report, recommending the Society to support it by every means in its power, has been printed in the Journal Asiatique.

Sir Alexander then reported that M. Moreau (whose statistical labours were particularly alluded to) had been appointed Honorary French Secretary to the Committee, and that the following gentlemen have applied their attention to objects pointed out to them by the Committee:—Mr. Frost has undertaken to Asiatic Journ. Vol. 25. No. 148.

3 S furnish furnish a scientific description of the valuable collection of original drawings of plants, &c. presented to the Society by Col. Farquhar; Mr. Upham has furnished a detailed description of the curiosities deposited in the Society's museum by Capt. Marryat; Dr. Dorn will furnish an account of the brass celestial globe, part of Sir J. Malcolm's collection, of which it is believed there is but one other specimen in Europe; Professor Lee has examined a very curious Hindu astronomical instrument, presented to the Society by Major Caulfield, and also a kind of forestaff, presented by Sir A. Johnston, and used by the navigators of the Maldive islands; and, lastly, Dr. Meyrick has consented to inspect the arms, &c. in the Society's possession, and to furnish a report thereon.

In concluding, Sir Alexander apologized to the meeting for the length to which his remarks had extended, and hoped that his statement of what the Committee had accomplished since its institution, would prove satisfactory to the meeting.

It was then moved that the reports of the Council and Auditors should be printed, to accompany the Society's Transactions; upon which the President expressed his conviction that the reading of those reports must have afforded great gratification to every member present, inasmuch as they clearly proved the Society to be in a state of increasing prosperity. The last year he considered the most prosperous, as regards the attainments of its objects, which the Society had yet passed; and that a more general interest in Oriental literature was beginning to be felt, ample proofs were afforded, by the bequest lately made to the University of Oxford for the purpose of founding a Sanscrit professorship, and by the list of subscribers towards effecting the objects of the Oriental Translation Committee; and more immediately in relation to the Society, by the increased attendance at its meetings, and numerous donations presented to its library and museum.

The President next alluded to the death of the King of Oude, of which event intelligence had just arrived. His Majesty was an honorary member of the Society. The President proceeded to remark upon the communication from a native of India, Radhacant Deb, which was laid before the last general meeting of the Society, and enlarged upon the importance to the Society of assistance from the learned natives of India, and the expediency of stimulating their literary labours, by conferring such suitable honours as it was in the power of the Society to bestow; he felt convinced that only such encouragement was needed to draw forth the latent talents, which now lie dormant in many natives of India, and which, if properly exerted and directed, would prove as honourable to themselves as advantageous to their country.

The President observed that the lateness of the hour precluded him from expatiating upon these topics, and stated, that having felt himself not qualified for the distinguished situation he held in the Society, on account of having never been in India, or having possessed sufficient leisure to devote himself to the study of Oriental literature, he had retained it principally on the ground of his official connexion with India, which connexion having lately ceased, he felt that the Society could easily, among the many learned individuals connected with Asia whom he saw around him, supply his place with one who would fill it more creditably to himself, and more beneficially to the interests of the Society; he begged to say, therefore, that he held himself perfectly prepared to resign the chair whenever the Society thought proper. The President concluded by putting the question upon the following motion, made by Lieut. Col. C. Doyle:

" That

"That the reports of the Council and Auditors, read at the meeting this day, be printed in the Appendix to the next volume of the Society's Transactions;" and, in addition to this, the President moved,

"That Sir Alexander Johnston be requested to draw up a copy of the report he has just delivered, from any notes or memoranda he may have in his possession, for the purpose of the same being printed, to accompany the preceding reports in the Society's Transactions;" and Sir Alexander having assented thereto, the question was put, and carried unanimously.

Sir A. Johnston then rose, and after a few preliminary observations, moved "That the thanks of the meeting be presented to the President, for his zealous attention to the Society's interests, and that he be requested to continue to hold the situation of President;" which motion being seconded by Capt. Melville Grindlay, was carried with great applause.

The President, in returning thanks to the Society for the honour he had just received, expressed his willingness to continue in the office of President; but repeated, that whenever the Society should think fit to substitute a more worthy Chairman, he should be quite ready to meet its wishes, and would endeavour, as a private member, to further the objects of the Society to the best of his power.

The thanks of the Society were then moved, seconded, and voted unanimously to the Council and Auditors, and to Sir Alexander Johnston, for the reports severally made by them to this meeting; and to the Director, Vice-Presidents, Treasurer, and Secretary, for their services during the past year.

The meeting then proceeded to ballot for the election of eight new members of Council, in place of eight going out, in terms of Art. XXI. of the Society's Regulations, and for the officers to serve for the ensuing year. The scrutineers (Lient. Col. Lushington and Mr. Hodgson) having examined the balloting lists, reported that the following members were withdrawn from the Council, viz. The Right Hon. Lord Bexley; Sir E. H. East, Bart.; Sir R. Barclay, K.C.B.; H. Alexander, Esq., M.P.; J. Guillemard, Esq.; W. Marsden, Esq.; W. H. Trant, Esq., M.P.; and Daniel Moore, Esq. (deceased); and that the following gentlemen were elected in their room, viz. His Grace the Duke of Somerset; the Right Hon. Sir G. Ouseley, Bart.; Sir C. Forbes, Bart.; Lieut. Col. Briggs; Richard Clarke, Esq.; Capt. R. M. Grindlay; G. C. Haughton, Esq.; and F. H. Toone, Esq.

The only alteration made in the list of officers was reported to be the substitution of the Right Hon. Sir G. Ouseley as Vice-President, in place of Sir E. H. East.

The next general meeting of the Society will be on the 19th of April, that which should be held on the 5th of that month being passed over in consequence of its occurring in Easter week.

A very valuable historical roll of one of the principal families of Rajpootana, some specimens of sculpture, and other curious articles, were exhibited in the meeting room to-day. They were sent by Col. Tod, and will be presented at the next general meeting, when a more detailed account of them will be furnished.

VARIETIES."

ASIATIC SOCIETY OF CALCUTTA.

A meeting of the Society was held on the 14th Nov., the Hon. W. B. Bayley, Esq., vice president, in the chair.

The Society on this occasion elected the Hon. Sir C. E. Grey president, and Sie Charles Metralfe vice-president. The Sir Charles Metcalfe vice-president. following gentlemen were also chosen members: Sir Edward Ryan, Capt. Sterling, and Dr. J. Tytler. Mons. Belanger, naturalist of the French government at Pondicherry, was elected an honorary member.

With reference to the increasing zeal and activity in geological research of late in India, the Society resolved, that a geological class or committee should be formed of such members of the Society as may be inclined to associate for this purpose, forming such regulations as they may find expedient, to be submitted for the confirmation of the Society.

A paper by Dr. Tytler, on the dugong, or duyong, with drawings by Mr. Bennet, was read to the meeting. The bones of four different individuals of this genus were picked up by Dr. Tytler at Raffles' Bay, on the north coast of New Holland: in one instance they were sufficiently numerous to form nearly an entire skeleton of the animal, which is placed in the Society's museum. dugong, from its peculiar upright position in the water, and the general appearance of the upper part of the body, is supposed to have given rise to the tales of mermen seen in the castern seas Although noticed by the Dutch travellers and naturalists, who termed it the seacow, it was very imperfectly known until descriptions and specimens were sent to Europe by the late Sir Stamford Raffles, and observations from that source, by Sir Everard Home, were published in the Philosophical Transactions. The animal is not uncommon in the eastern archipelago, but its existence on the coast of New Holland is made known by Dr. Tytler for the first time. Dr. T. is disposed to think that some affinity may exist between the duyong and the dagon of the Philistines, as the latter was probably a compound of the head of a graminivorous animal with the tail of a fish, and thus resembled the sea-cow in structure as well as name.

A notice by Capt. Herbert, of the site of coal in the Himalaya, with specimens, was also submitted. This mineral is found throughout the whole line of sandstone-hills that lie at the foot of the great Himalaya chain, forming the transition to the plains. It occurs in flat veins or seams, more or less inclined to the horizon, the greatest thickness of which has not been found to exceed nine inches or a foot, whilst in general they are much smaller, not exceeding, in some places, the twentieth of an inch. The composition is in general impalpable, but sometimes assumes the ligneous structure. Where the ligneous fibre has disappeared, the fracture is conchoidal, and frequently marked with concentric circles, similar to cannel coal. It burns with flame, giving out a thick smoke and bituminous smell, and leaves a reddish brown ash of equal bulk with the original fragment. These properties refer it to the bituminous coal of Mohs.

Besides the locality of the mountain coal pointed out by Lieut. T. Cautley, in his communications to the Society, Captain Herbert has discovered the following :- I. The Timla Pass, leading into the Dehra-doon, specimens of the coal from which place were sent by Captain II., in 1817, to the late Dr. Voysey, and pronounced by him to be the brown coal of Werner. 2. The Kheri Pass, where it principally exists as lignite of considerable thickness: it is found here in two places. 3. Ascent from Bhamouri to the Bhim Tal in the bed of the This is considered by Captain Raliya. H. as best entitled to attention. largest vein is about four inches thick. and the coal has a high lustre, and occasionally a perfect conchoidal fracture, resembling cannel coal; it burns with a brilliant flame, emitting a sulphurous smell, and being occasionally incrusted with sulphur: the specific gravity averages about 1.3. Capt. H. seems to think that these indications do not authorize any expectation that coal-mines of any extent will be found in the Himalaya, although it is not impossible that they may exist in the trough between the secondary sandstone that skims the great chain, and the primary sandstone which makes its appearance at Delhi and other places.

A paper, by Dr. Govan, was laid before the meeting, containing a report on the mineral and vegetable products of the country about Nahn, with registers of the weather for April and May last.

An abstract of the registers of the barometer and thermometer kept at Singapore, from 1820 to 1825, by Captain Davis, was also submitted.

Observations on the geology of part of Bundlecund, Boghelcund, Saugor, and Jubulpur, were also communicated by Captain Franklin. These observations commence

commence at Mirzapore, and include different portions of the ranges of hills belonging to the great central zone of Hin-The first range of hills, the tract in which the falls of the Tonse occur, and the country to Hathi, beyond Lohargong, are of sandstone. At Hathi it is succeeded by argillaceous or Lias limestone, which is considered by Captain Franklin as the same with the Lias limestone of England. Beyond this to Saugor the overlying rocks are of trap, and at the place below the upper surface of that rock occur wacke and basalt, and an earthy or impure limestone, beneath which is amygdaloid, lying on sandstone. The northern barrier of the valley of the Nerbudda consists of the primitive rocks. Jubulpur is situated at the foot of a range of granite hills. Captain Franklin is of opinion that granite is the basis of the different ranges visited in his tour; in some places near the surface, but in others separated from secondary formations by intervening stratifications of primary rock. The sandstone formation is in general of considerable thickness, whilst the limestone differs from that found in other parts of the world by being merely superficial, and not exceeding an average thickness of fifty feet. A collection of specimens accompanied Captain Franklm's communication, as well as a geolorical map and section, and series of barometrical elevations .- Cal. John Bull.

AGRICULTURAL AND HORTICULTURAL SOCIETY OF CALCUTTA.

The Society, with the view of promoting the objects of their institution, have resolved to offer their gold medal for the best essay on each of the undermentioned subjects. In so doing, they propose being guided by the same rules as are generally adopted by other societies on similar occasions; and they accordingly desire that, in the competition, the following conditions may be strictly kept in view.

The essays may be composed in any known language; but if not in English, they must be accompanied by an English translation. They are to be addressed to the secretary, on or before the 31st December 1828, under a cover inscribed with a motto, or in any other manner that may identify it, with a sealed note accompanying it, which is to contain the name and address of the author. such sealed note will be opened except for the express purpose of ascertaining the name of the candidate to whom the medal may have been adjudged. others, together with the essays to which they belong, will at the expiration of the term be restored to their owner, on being inquired after, or ultimately destroyed. No candidate can be permitted to be present at any meeting of the Society, or its committee, assembled to adjudge the merits of their respective essays.

List of Prize Subjects.

 Indian soils, comprizing their analysis and the properties which render certain kinds peculiarly adapted for some; and hostile to other descriptions of cultivation.

2. Manures, with an analysis founded on the best and most conclusive experiments conducted in this country; their adaptation to peculiar soils and to peculiar objects of cultivation.

3. Acclimating foreign plants, chiefly those of Europe, the Cape of Good Hope, and New South Wales; with a description of the most successful mode of importing plants, roots, and seeds into this country.

4. The cultivation and manufacture of indigo, with estimates of the produce from a given quantity of land, under different circumstances, and in various parts of India.

5. The cultivation of the sugar-cane and the manufacture of sugar, with detailed estimates.

6. The cultivation of coffee in Hindustan, founded on a comparison of the practice adopted in other countries, with the peculiarities belonging to this part of India, with estimates of the produce, &c.

N. Wallich, M.D. Sec. Agr. & Hort. Soc. Calcutta, 24th Sept. 1827.

MEDICAL AND PHYSICAL SOCIETY OF

A meeting of this Society was held on the 10th November, Mr. Wilson, vicepresident, in the chair.

An account of the ginseng of Nepal, by Dr. Wallich, was read, and a description of the excision of a tumour above the left upper eyelid, by Mr. Bell, of Muradabad. A report, by Dr. Govan, on the mineral and vegetable proflicts of the Himalaya, presented by the Government, was also read; as was a case of hydrophobia, treated with superacetate of lead, by Mr. Pearson, of Ramghur.

The ginseng was found on the summit of a mountain between nine and ten thousand feet above the plains of Bengal, and appears limited to that site, not being discovered in any other situation. The natives of Nepal make no use of it, and are wholly unacquainted with the plant, notwithstanding the high estimation in which it is held by the Chinese. The plant is denominated by Dr. Wallich panax pseudo-ginseng, being a species of the same genus only nearly allied to the genuine ginseng of Chinese Tartary and North America.

The report of Dr. Govan is introducttory to his future inquiries in the region in which he is employed, and the natural history of which he has undertaken to explore.

The case of hydrophobia is interesting from the apparently beneficial effect of the remedy. The patient was a boy ten years old, who had been bitten two months before, and in whom, when brought to Mr. Pearson, at noon on the 28th July, the case was clearly marked. After bleeding four ounces, twenty drops of the solution of superacetate of lead were administered. and in above an hour the patient was able to drink a little water, although, when first brought in, violent spasms were induced by simply pouring it out before him. The medicine was repeated in similar doses every hour for the three first hours, and again at half-past four, at seven, at halfpast eight, at ten, at half-past twelve, at six A M. on the 29th, and again at ten, when the boy drank from a shell quite easily; a dose of thirty drops was again given at noon, and a second bleeding ordered, when the parents of the child removed him from the care of the European surgeon: at ten at night he was again sent for, and pursued a similar course; but in the interval that had elapsed the disease had gained so much ground that little good could be expected, and the case terminated fatally. Whether the disease would have been subdued by this treatment is, therefore, left doubtful, but the advantage obtained is sufficient to authorize the further trial of the medicine. -Cal. Gov. Gaz.

LINNAAN SOCIETY.

At a meeting on the 5th Feb. was read " Some account of the botany of the provinces lately ceded by the Burmese to the Hon. the East-India Company, with a description of two new genera of plants; in a letter to H. T. Colebrooke, Esq., F.R.S., &c.; by Nathaniel Wallich, M.D., F.L.S., &c., superintendent of the Botanic Garden at Calcutta." The author states that his botanical treasures are most extensive; the number of species having long ago surpassed 2,000. and that he has never seen any vegetable production equal to his Amherstia nobilis when in full bloom. It surpasses all the Indian plants.

Amherstia. Diadelphia Decandria— Nat. Ord. Leguminosæ. The flowers of this splendid tree are disposed in pyramidal pendulous clusters two feet long, and ten inches broad at the base. Leaves one foot and a half long, with eight or ten pair of oblong pointed pinnæ, which are from eight to ten inches long, and of a peculiarly delicate glaucous hue. The racemes are scarlet. The petals are furnished at' the spex with a broad yellow spot, having a tubular calyx; and the genus is evidently allied to Heterostemon of Desfontaines.

Dr. Wallich has at length found the varnish-tree of the Burmese, which he constitutes a new genus, and calls it Melanorrhaa; Polyandria Monogynia: Anacardise, Brown .- Also another singular plant, which he calls Phytocrene gigantea, allied to Araliaceze. The trunk as thick as a man's thigh, and when divided affords a large quantity of a lim. pid, tasteless, and very wholesome water.

INCREASE OF RUSSIAN POWER IN ASIA.

An article in a French publication comments upon the great accession of territory which the Russians are gaining in Asia, by means of their encroachments upon the Kirgheez tribes, whose country has now a chain of Russian military posts on the western side, intended to keep them in awe, and to prevent them from changing their positions. By thus extending itself, the Russian frontier is described as now only 280 leagues from Attock on the Indus, and a much shorter distance still from Bokhara. A part of the Kirgheez tribes comprehended within the new demarcation of the Russian empire were formerly dependent upon China; that is, they sent presents every three years to Peking, in return for which the Chinese government made them presents an hundred-fold more valuable. But these tribes were very inconvenient neighbours; and probably the Chinese have consented without reluctance to their being placed under the control of the Russians, who know how to keep them in order. may be presumed with equal probability," says the article, "that the Russians will not rest here. The facility with which they have got possession of a part of Turkistan, vulgarly called independent, will inspire them with a desire to occupy in the same manner the whole country of the Kirgheez, as far as the frontiers of the khanat of Bokhara: they will accomplish this with the more facility, inasmuch as such aggrandizements as these are almost wholly unknown to and are never resisted by the powers of Europe. Once established in the Kirgheez country, which is not throughout an arid steppe, but includes lands and meadows of great fertility, as well as forests and mountains, the Russians may transport thither military colonies, establish founderies near the copper-mines, prepare all the necessary military munitions for a campaign, and complete their cavalry with the excellent horses of Middle Asia, for the purchase of which the late Mr. Moorcroft was despatched into Bucharia by the Anglo-Indian government. They may also make convenient roads there, and in a few years complete their arrangements for ulterior conquests. They will probably begin with Kokand. Samarcand, Bokhara, and other little khanats, which separate Russia from Persia and India."

LA PEROUSE.

Certain intelligence of the fate of this unfortunate navigator has been at length obtained. We have been favoured by Sir William Betham with the following extract from a letter he has received from Mr. John Russell, his nephew :-

" Hon. East-India Company's ship Research, New Zealand, Nov. 7, 1827.

"My dear Sir William:—I have the pleasure to inform you of our safe arrival here, after a successful voyage, to ascertain the fate of La Perouse and his ships. They were both wrecked the same night on a reef off the Manico Island, situated in lat. 11° 40' S., and long. 167° E. One of the ships sunk in deep water after striking on a reef of rocks, and all on board perished; the other was thrown on the reef, and those of the crew who escaped were able to save from the wreck materials enough to build a small vessel, at a place called Palou, where many of them were killed by the natives; but were enabled to finish their little vessel, in which they all left the island, with the exception of two men, about five months after their shipwreck. One of these men died about three years since; the other left the island in a canoe, and his fate is unknown; most likely he perished, as we have searched all the adjacent islands, but could obtain no information of him.

" We have obtained the clearest proofs that these ships were French, and have on board several pieces of silver and copper stamped with a fleur-de-lis; also a large bell, with an inscription thereon, BAZIN M'A FAIT, in large letters; a second bell, with the arms of France, and part of the ornamented stern of the ship, with a large gilt fleur-de-lis.

" We have also found part of a plated candlestick, engraved with the following arms:—Azure, a satyr between a mullet in chief and a crescent in base, or. Supporters, two lions rampant regardant. Over the shield a viscount's coronet."

" Sir William Betham, Ulster King of Arms, Dublin."

N.B. These arms are those of the French family of Cotignon .- Dublin Pa-

NEPAL WOODCOCK.

It appears from a Calcutta paper, that a bird has recently been found in Nepal. which seems to form a link between the.

woodcock and the snipe. The details given are teo imperfect to enable a scienan undescribed species, or whether it be not what is denominated "the great or solitary snipe:" it bears a much greater resemblance to the woodcock (though smaller) than to the snipe. "The unknown has the characters assigned to the head and eye of the woodoock rather than those of the snipe's head and eye. The unknown is like the woodcock, entirely coloured and cross-barred all over; but whereas the prevalent brown hue is, in the woodcock, burnished with red, in the unknown it is obscured with a muddy darkness. The wing of the unknown is broad and not sharply angular, like that The unknown, like the of the snipe. woodcock, rises silently. Lastly, the habits of the unknown are entirely the same with those of the woodcock."

NATURAL HISTORY OF TARTARY.

A tour in Asia has been performed by Professor Ledebuhr, Dr. Meyer, and Dr. Bunge, to the Altai mountains, on the frontiers of the Chinese empire. tour, the object of which was the almost unknown Flora of these remote regions, has proved eminently successful. travellers have collected 1,600 species of plants, of which nearly 500 are new; so that Professor Ledebuhr intends to publish a Flora Altaica. Geography, statistics, zoology, and mineralogy, were not neglected in the course of this excursion, the narrative of which is expected to be highly interesting, and will be published, as we are informed, first in English .-For. Qu. Rev.

THE LATE SEE DAVID OCHTERLONY.

The following account of the late Sir D. Ochterlony occurs in the recently published "Journal of Bishop Heber:

Jan. 27. This morning we marched eight long coss to Mohunpoora. In the way I had an opportunity of seeing some part of the magnificence which Dr. Smith had described, for we passed Sir David Ochterlony and his suite on his road to Bhurtpoor. There certainly was a very considerable number of led horses, elephants, palanqueens, and covered car-riages, belonging chiefly, I apprehend (besides his own family), to the families of his native servants. There was an escort of two companies of infantry, a troop of regular cavalry, and I should guess forty or fifty irregulars, on horse and foot, armed with spears and matchlocks of all possible forms; the string of camels was a very long one, and the whole procession was what might pass in Europe for that of an eastern prince travelling. Still neither in numbers nor splendour did it at all equal my expectation. Sir David himself was in a carriage and four, and civilly got out to speak to me. He is a tall and pleasing-looking old man, but was so wrapped up in shawls, kincob, fur, and a Mogul furred cap, that his face was all that was visible. I was not sorry to have even this glimpse of an old officer, whose exploits in India have been so distinguished. His history is a curious one. He is the son of an American gentleman who lost his estate and country by his loyalty during the war of the separation. Sir David himself came out a cadet, without friends, to India, and literally fought his way to notice. The most brilliant parts of his career were his defence of Delhi against the Maharatta army, and the conquest of Kemaoon from the Ghorkhas. He is now considerably above seventy, infirm, and has often been advised to return to England. But he has been absent from thence fifty-four years; he has there neither friend nor relation-he has for many years been habituated to eastern habits and parade, and who can wonder that he clings to the only country in the world where he can feel himself at home? Within these few days I had been reading Coxe's Life of Marlborough, and at this moment it struck me forcibly how little it would have seemed in the compass of possibility to any of the warriors, states-men, or divines of Queen Anne's time, that an English general and an English bishop would ever shake hands on a desert plain in the heart of Rajpootana!

LOOKING AT THE MOON.

On the 10th Bhadra (Hindu calendar), 26th August, it is considered unlucky to look at the moon, whence it is also called Nashta Chandra, or "the moon lost." The superstition of not looking at the moon on particular days is not exclusively Hindu, although not limited to exactly the same times, nor founded on similar belief. The period of the new moon is, in general, that held inauspicious in Eu-The Hindus proscribe both the fourth lunations of this month, on account of the sun's being in the sign Leo, and if the moon be looked at on those days, the person may expect to be wrongfully accused of some crime before the end of the month. The idea originates in a story, told in several of the Puranas, of Krishna's being falsely accused of theft. A prince of the Yadu family, Satrajit, obtained a valuable gem from his friend Aditya, or the sun, which, when worn by a virtuous person, was the source of infinite wealth, but if worn by a person of bad character, became the cause of his death. Satrajit gave it to wear to his brother Prasenajit, who, coming under the latter description, was attacked, whilst.

hunting, by a lion, and killed. anatched up the gem, when he was assailed by the monarch of the bears, Jambuyan, who killed him and carried off the prize. As it was notorious that Krishna had been desirous of possessing the gem. his kindred, who were equally those of the deceased, suspected him of having murdered Prasenajit; to remove which impression, he conducted them to search for the latter in the woods. As the traces of his death were apparent, Krishna was acquitted, but in memory of the transaction, in which a lion bore so principal a share, it became unlucky to see the moon on that day on which the business occurred, the sun being in Leo. After being satisfied of the fate of Prasenajit, the Yadayas returned to Dwaraka, but Krishna prosecuted the search, recovered the jewel from the bear, and restored it to Satrajit, its original owner. Sir Wm. Jones says : Krishna, when accused, hid himself in the moon; but this is not mentioned in the Puranas. In the south of India. Ganesa is worshipped on this day, whence it is also named Ganesa Chaturthi .- Cal. Gov. Gaz.

SOVEREIGNS OF ASIA AND AFRICA.

M. Saint Martin has published in the Nouveau Journal Asiatique an historical, chronological, and genealogical catalogue (which he proposes to continue annually) of the principal sovereigns of Asia and north Africa. He describes the list as defective, for want of opportunity to make the requisite researches; and he solicits the aid of those persons who possess accurate information upon the subject.

The Ottoman Empire.

Sultan Mahmoud II., son of Sultan Abdul Hamed, born 20th July 1785, proclaimed instead of his brother, Mustapla IV., who was dethroned 28th July 1808.

Egypt: Mohammed Ali, born at Cavala in Roumelia in 1769 (A.H. 1182), son of Ibrahim Aga; proclaimed Pacha 14th May 1805, in the place of Khorshid Pacha; confirmed by Sultan Selim III. 1st April 1806.

Bagdat: Daoud Pacha.

Moldavia: John Stourza, a Moldavian boyard, nominated Hospodar 16th July 1822, and proclaimed at Yassy 21st of the same month.

Wallachia: Gregory Ghika, nominated Hospodar 16th July 1822; inaugurated by the Pacha of Silistria 21st September 1822.

Vassals of the Ottoman Empire. Tripoli: Yuffouf, Bey, since 1795.

Tunis: Sidi Hassan, Bey, succeeded Hamuda Bey 23d March 182

Algiers: Hussein, son of Hassan, formerly minister of the interior, succeeded, lst March 1818, the Dey Ali, who died of the plague. He is about fifty-four years of age.

Mecca: Yahya, Scherif, son of Sooroor, substituted, 2d November 1813, for his uncle Ghaleb, who was deposed by Mohammed Ali, the Pacha of Egypt, and died at Salonica in 1818.

Yemen: ---, Imam, succeeded, in 1815, Tamy, chief of the tribe of Aser, made prisoner by the Arab Hassan, son of Caled, allied to the pacha Mohammed Ali. and sent dead to Constantinople in 1815.

Sennaar: Bady VII., son of Tabl, twenty-ninth king of the race of the Foungees, a tribe from the interior of Africa, who established themselves at Sennaar towards the close of the fifteenth century. In June 1821, Ismael, son of the Pacha of Egypt, compelled him to recognize the supremacy of Sultan Mahmood.

Empire of Morocco.

Muley Abd-er-Rahman, sultan, succeeded his father, Muley Suleyman, 28th November 1822.

Kingdom of Abyssinia.

Itsa Guarloo, of the dynasty of Solomon, which has reigned without interruption since 1268; resides at Gondar; the independent chiefs, in whose hands is the whole authority, are Ras Weled Sclassy, Ras Gabri, Guxar, Ras Illao, Libban, and Goga.

Muscat.

Seyud Saïd, Imam, succeeded his father Seyud Sultan, about the year 1804; he is the third in descent from Ahmed, son of Said, the founder of this state.

Persia.

Feti Ali Shah, of the Turkish tribe of the Cadjars, named Baba Khan prior to his accession to the throne; son of Hussein Kooli Khan; born in 1768; succeeded in 1796 his uncle Aga Mohammed Khan, founder of the dynasty.

Abbas Mirza, heir presumptive to the crown, born in 1785.

Afghanistan.
The royal family is descended from Ahmed Shah Abdalli, a branch of the Saduzees; the royal title is Shah Doori After the death of Timoor Khan, which happened 20th May 1793, his sons disputed with each other the succession to the supreme authority, and made a partition of the empire. In 1826, Yar Mohammed Khan, residing at Peshawer, and Poordil Khan, of Candahar, expelled their brother, Dost Mohammed Khan, who reigned at Cabul.

Brloochistan. Mahmood Khan, aged about forty-six Anatie Journ. Vol. 25. No.148.

years, succeeded his father Naser Khan in June 1795.

Balkh.

Conquered in 1825 by Meer Murad Bey, who expelled Nejeb Oollah Khan, governor for the King of Cabul.

Bokhara.

Great khan of Bokhara and Samarcand, Batkar Khan, succeeded his father Meer Hyder Khan, in 1826. The intermediate reign of his brother, Meer Hussein, lasted only four months.

Governor of Hissar, Seyud Atalik Bey, father-in-law of Meer Hyder.

Kokand.

Ameer Khan, prince of Ferghanah and Kokand.

Badakshan.

Mirza Abd'ul Ghafool, son of Mohammed Shah, resides at Faezabad, a city distinct from Badakshan, and situated to the southward of it.

Kharezm.

Rahman Kooli Khan, succeeded his father, Mohammed Raheem Khan, in 1826; the title of these princes, who are of Usbek extraction, is Taksir Khan; they reside at Khiva.

Claina.

The name of the reigning dynasty, which is of Manchoo origin, is Ta-tsing (the most pure). In China the name of the reigning emperor is not known. The prince who now fills the throne is the second son of his predecessor, who died 2d September 1820. The honorific title of the reign of the present monarch is Taoukwang, or "lustre of reason."

Japan.

The Cobo (emperor) has reigned since 1804. The public are unacquainted with his name during his life. The year 1811 was the eighth of the Nengo (honorific title of the reign) Boonwa.

SNAKE-CATCHERS.

The secret of rendering docile, and handling with impunity, the most venomous serpents, which has so long been in the possession of the inhabitants of Western India, is not unknown in China. It is observed that the native snake-catchers here rub their hands previously to taking hold of the snake with an antidote composed of pounded herbs. The virtue of the preparation is such, that they hold with the naked hand, and provoke fearlessly the deadly cobra de capello, or spectacle viper, a serpent which, next to the rattle-snake of North America, is perhaps one of the most dangerous reptiles in existence. This serpent, in common with others of a similar nature, are not unfrequently met with in Canton in the possession of these men, who, for a ST trifling gratuity, exhibit them to the curious spectator. - Canton Register.

UNION OF THE ATLANTIC AND PACIFIC.

It appears by letters from Amsterdam, that the project of cutting a canal to unite the Gulf of Mexico with the Pacific Ocean is about to be revived under the auspices of the Netherlands Government, which has entered into communication with the government of Gautemala, or Central America, for that purpose. General Van Veer, who was deputed on that mission, has just returned to Europe, and it is stated that several persons are on their way to the Netherlands from Guatemala, who are authorized to carry into effect the arrangements connected with the undertaking. Some exclusive advantages, as an inducement to engage in the project, have been offered to the Dutch Government; and it is said that the King himself has entered into it with so much earnestness, that he has composed a long memoir to point out its probabilities of success, and the benefits with which it will be attended. A vessel has been ordered to be in readiness to carry out to Gautemala the engineers and persons appointed to survey the ground through which the proposed canal is to pass.-

NEW PUBLICATIONS.

ENGLAND.

Letters addressed to a Young Person in India, calculated to afford Instruction for his Conduct in general, and more especially in his Intercourse with the Natives. By Lieut. Col. John Briggs, late Resident at Satara. Post Nov. 7s. 6d.

Proceedings of the Expodution to Replace the Northern Coast of Africa, comprehending an Actount of the Syrtis and Cyrenaica; of the Ancient Cities composing the Pentapolis, and various other existing Remains. By Capt. F. W. Beechey, R. N., and H. W. Beechey, Esq. 4to., with Plates. $3.38.

£3. 38.

and II. W. Beechey, Esq. 4to., with Plates. 23. 3s. Sophia de Lissou; or, a Portraiture of the Lews of the Nineteenth Century; being an Outline of their Religious and Domestic Habits; with Explanatory Notes. 12mo.

On the Methode of Determining Terrestrial Longitudes by the Moon's Right Accession, as deduced from her Altitudes and Culminations. By John Criep, Capt. Medras Army. 4to. 8s. Researches into the Causes, Nature, and Treatment of the more prevalent Diseases of India, and of Warm Climates generally. Illustrated with Cases, Post Mortem Examinations, &c. By James Annesley, Esq., of the Madras Medical Establishment. Vol. I imperial 4to., with Map and Coloured Plates. £7, 7s. Introduction to the Hindonstance Language; in Three Parts. By W. Yates, author of a Sunscrif Grammar on a new plan, &c. 2vo. bds. Part 1. of a Descriptive Catalogue of the Leptopterous Inserts contained in the Museum of the Hon. East-India Company, Illustrated by Coloured Figures of New Species, and of the Metamorphos, of Indian Lepidoptera; with Introductory Observations on a General Arrangement of this order of Insects. By Thos. Horsfield, M.D., F.R.S., &c. Royal 4to. £1. 1is. 6d.; or, with all the plates coloured and proof impressions, £2. 2s. (To be completed in Sky parts.)

History of the Life and Voyages of Christopher Columbus. By Washington Irving. 4 vols. 8vo. £2. 3s.

22. 28. Chements of the Sanson't Languages; or, an Easy Guide to the Indian Tongues. By Wm. Price, M.R.S.L. 4to. 128.

A new Grammar of the Hindoostanee Language; to which are added. Selections from the best Authors, Familiar Phrases, and Dialogues, in the proper Character. By Wm. Price, M.R.S.L. 4to. 158.

Husn on Dil, or Beauty and Heart; a plea Allegory in Eleven Chapters, composed by Alfettah, of Nishapoor. (In Persian and English.)
Translated by Wm. Price, M.R.S.L. 4to. 12s.

In the Press, or Preparing for Publication.

In the Press, or Preparing for Prantication.

Journal of a Mission from the Governor-General of India to the Courts of Slam and Cochin-China.
By J. Crawfurd, Esq., F.R.S., &c., late Envoy.
4to., with Maps and numerous Plates.

A Tale of Jerusalem, an Historical Romance.
By Horace Smith.

Researches in South Africa. By the Rev. John Philip, D.D., Superintendent of the Missions of the London Missionary Society in South Africa. C. 2 vols. 8vo. Private Journal of a Voyage to the Parific Ocean, and a Resedence in the Sandwich Islands, during the years 1922, 23, 24, and 25. By C. S. Stewart, late American Missionary at the Sandwich Islands, with an Introduction and occasional Notes, by the Rev. W. Filis. 1 2000.

late American Missionary at the Sandwich Islands, with an Introduction and occasional Notes, by the Rev. W. Ellis. 12no.
The Missionary Cabmet, comprising a Gazetteer of all the places occupied by Christian Missionaries, with a brue Geographical Description, &c. By the Rev. C. Williams.
The Impions Forst, a Poem, in Ten Books. By Robert Landor, M.A.
Journal of the British Embussy to Person. By Wim. Price, Esq., F.R.S. L., Assistant Secretary to the Right Hon. Sir Gore Ouseley, Bart, Ambassador Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentary from His Britannic Majesty to the Court of Person. Vol. II. in oblong imperial 4to.
The Calendar of Prophecey. By the Rev. G. S. Faber. 3 vols. 8vo.
Lindia; or, Facts submitted to illustrate the Character and Condition of the Native Inhabitants, the causes which have, for ages, obstructed lis improvement, with suggestions for reforming the present system, and the measures to be adopted for the future government of that country, at the expiration of the present charter of the East-India Company. By Robert Rickards, Esq. (To be published in parts.)
Gomez Arras 7 or, the Moors of the Alpujarras: a Spanish Historical Romance. By Don Telesfor

Gomez Arias; or, the Moors of the Alpujarras; a Spanish Historical Romance. By Don Telesford de Trueba y Cosio. 3 vols. post 8vo.

RUSSIA.

In the Press.

A French and Turkuh Vocabhavy, by Mr. Rhasis, translator of Oriental languages to the Governor-General of New Russis. Frice, to Subscribers, 40 roubles; to Non-Subscribers, 50 roubles; to Mon-Subscribers, 50 roubles; to Subscribers, 50 roubles.

ASIATIC INTELLIGENCE.

Stalcutta.

GOVERNMENT GENERAL ORDERS.

ADDITIONAL BATTALIONS TO THE ENGINEERS AND ARTILLERY.

Fort William, Sept. 28, 1827.—The Hon. the Court of Directors having graciously acceded to the proposition of the Governor General in Council, that an additional battalion of officers for the corps of engineers be allowed to this presidency, and that another battalion of officers, to be attached to the Golundauz, be granted to the Bengal artillery; the Right Hon. the Vice-President in Council is pleased to resolve, that a battalion of officers of the strength detailed in the margin,* shall be added to each of these corps from this date.

The Golundauz on this establishment will be formed into two battalions of eight companies each, and by the allotment of twenty-three European commissioned officers per battalion, the artillery branch of the service will be organized upon the principle which obtains in the infantry; vr. that of assigning the same number of European commissioned officers to a European as to a native regiment, whilst the companies in each are as one to two.

His Exc. the Commander-in-chief is requested to supply the details necessary to give effect to these orders.

REVISED RELIEF OF TROOPS.

Head-Quarters, Calcutta, Oct. 13, 1827.

—Under instructions from government his Exc. the Right Hon. the Commander-inchief is pleased to cancel that part of the G. O. of date the 21st of August last, directing certain corps and details to proceed to Mhow, for the occupation of that post. The detachments of horse and foot atillery, and regiments of light cavalry and infantry, therein directed to proceed to that station, will therefore stand fast at their present posts until further orders.

Head-Quarters, Oct. 17, 1827.—With reference to G.O. of the 13th inst. the Commander-in-chief is pleased to publish to the army the following revised relief of the troops, which is to have effect in lieu of that which was published in G.O. of the 21st August last, at the times and in the order hereafter detailed:—

1st L.C., from Sultanpoor (Benares) to Muttra; to march 1st Nov. 1827.

6th L.C., from Muttra to Sultanpoor (Benares); to march 1st Nov. 1827.

a l col. or licut-col-comdt.; 1 licut-colonel; 1 major; 5 captains; 10 Ist-licutenants; 5 2d-licutenants.

3d Regt. N.I., from Lucknow to Loodehana; to march 1st Nov. 1827.

12th Regt. N.I., from Loodehana to 12th Regt N.I., from Loodehana to Nusseerabad; to march 1st Nov. 1827.

13th Regt. N I., from Jumalpoor to Mirzapoor; to march 15th Dec. 1827.

24th Regt. N.I., from Bhopaulpoor to Cawnpore; to march when relieved by 49th regt. N.I.

34th Regt. N.I., from Sectapoor to Saugor, when relieved by 62d regt. N.I. 43d Regt. N.I., from Saugor to Benares; to march 1st Nov. 1827.

49th Regt. N.I., from Mirzapoor to Bhopaulpoor, when relieved by 13th regt. N.I.

56th Regt. N.I., from Nusseerabad to Lucknow; to march 1st Nov. 1827.

62d Regt. N.I., from Benares to Scetapoor; to march 1st Nov.1827.

THE GOVERNOR-GENERAL.

Evot William, General Department, Oct. 16, 1827.—The Right Hon. the Earl Amherst, Governor General, &c. &c., having returned from the Upper Provinces, has this day resumed his seat in the couriel of the presidency of Fort William.

FURTHER DONATION TO THE TROOPS EM-

Fort William, Oct. 19, 1827 .- It affords the Right Hon, the Governor General in Council peculiar pleasure to announce, that the discipline, energy, and gallantry, manifested by the European and native troops employed in the late operations against the state of Ava, have been highly and justly appreciated by the Hon, the Court of Directors; and that, as a token of the favourable sentiments they entertain of the brilliant services achieved by those who had special opportunities of distinguishing themselves, and as a proof of the approbation with which they regard the zeal, courage, and patient perseverance evinced by all, in a manner so eminently calculated to sustain the character of the British arms, the Honourable Court have been pleased to award to the troops which served in Ava and Arracan a further donation, of equal amount to that which was conferred by the Supreme Government in General Orders, No. 170 A., of the 3d of August 1826, and in the same proportious, viz. six months' full batta for a service in those territories of one year and upwards, and three months' full batta for a service of any period less than a year.

In giving effect to this resolution of the home authorities, the Governor General in Council is pleased to declare, that the benefits of this further donation, spontaneously granted by the Honourable Court, are extended to all who were entitled to the indulgence conceded in the abovecited General Orders, the provisions of which are to be considered applicable, in all their specifications, to the issue now sanctioned.

nefits

Fort William, Nov. 2, 1827 .- With reference to G.O. of 19th ultimo, the Governor General in Council is pleased to publish the following extracts of communications on the subject from the Hon. the Court of Directors.

General Letter, dated 28th March 1827. Par. 5. " It is our intention that the donation granted by you, as well as that now authorized, should be paid out of the money received from the government of Ava.

6. "You will be pleased to inform us of the particulars of the payment made under the resolution which we have now confirmed.

General Letter, dated 25th April 1827. Par. 46. " With reference to our despatch of the 28th March ult., communicating our authority for the grant of a donation of batta to the troops which served in Ava, we desire that, after allowing a sufficient period for paying to such of the troops as may be in India the sums due to them, you will cause returns to be prepared, specifying the names of the Europeans of every description entitled to participate in the donation, and who, in consequence of having quitted India before the donations were in course of payment, have not received the amount, either personally or by their agents, together with the amount which they, in each case, may be entitled to receive, and that these returns he forwarded to us by the earliest opportunity.

" Copy paragraphs which will be inserted in the next military general letter, dated 3d July 1827 :-

" In reference to the resolution of your government, dated the 21st July 1826, granting a donation of batta to the troops employed in the late war; and to our despatch to you, dated the 28th of March 1827, granting a further similar donation; we have to acquaint you, that, adverting to the cases of officers and men who may have left India previously to the promulgation of the first resolution, or who having received batta under that resolution, may have quitted India previously to the receipt of our order for the further grant, we have resolved that payment, in such cases, be made in England at the rates of exchange observed in other transactions of the Company, and which, in the present year, is 2s. the Bengal sicca rupee.
"We have thought it right to require from officers receiving payments under this arrangement, security to reimburse the amount in the event of its having been issued in India."

STAFF SITUATIONS.

Fort William, Oct. 26, 1827 .- The Right Hon, the Governor General in Council is pleased to relax the operation of the rule published in G.O. of the 17th August last, limiting the number of officers to five simultaneously absent from any one corps on staff employ, in favour of officers unequal for a limited period to the performance of regimental duty, from wounds received on service, and to declare all such officers eligible to be appointed to staff situations without reference to the number absent from the corps to which they belong; but this relaxation of the rule in favour of wounded officers is not to be considered as giving any permanent increase for staff employ from the regiments of such officers, the number allowed from them being, as from all other corps, limited to five, to which it will be reduced as situations lapse.

Fort William, Oct. 26, 1827 .- Adverting to certain inconveniences which experience has shewn to be involved in the operation of that part of General Orders, under date the 1st of January 1819, which declares regimental staff officers ineligible to the command of any troop or company, along with their staff situations, the Right Hon, the Governor General in Council is pleased to cancel so much of those orders as preclude adjutants and interpreters and quarter-masters from the command or charge of troops and companies, when entitled to such privilege by their standing in their respective regiments.

This resolution necessarily rescinds General Orders of the 17th of July 1819, so far as the order in question directs the discontinuance of regimental staff officers on the muster rolls of troops and compa-nies. Their names are still, however, to be borne on the muster rolls of their respective departments, and they are to be returned on the strength of their corps as non-effective staff.

DEMISE OF THE KING OF OUDE.

Fort William, Oct. 27, 1827.—The Right Hon. the Governor General in Council, having this day received from the resident at the Court of Lucknow, the melancholy intelligence of the demise of his Majesty the King of Oude, on the 20th instant, is pleased to direct, that minute guns to the number of fifty-eight, corresponding with the years of the deceased, he fired from the ramparts of Fort William, and at all the principal stations of the army under this presidency.

Fort William, Oct. 30, 1827 .- His Majesty Solyman Jah Nusseer-ood-deen Hyder, son of his late Majesty Abool Moozuster Moiz-ood-deen, Shah Zumeen Ghazee-ood-deen Hyder, having ascended the throne of Oude on the 20th instant, the Right Hon. the Governor General in Council lass been pleased to direct, that a royal salute and three vollies of musketry shall be fired from the ramparts of Fort William, and at all the principal stations of the army, in bonour of that event.

501

TOUR OF THE COMMANDER-IN-CHIEF.

Head-Quarters, Oct. 31, 1827.—The Commander-in-chief is pleased to notify, that his Exc. will leave the presidency on the 1st proximo by dawk, and proceed by Berhampore, Dinapore, Benares, and Allahabad to Cawnpore, where his Lordship's head-quarters will be established on the 27th proximo.

All reports and communications from the different stations of the army which are intended for his Excellency's information, as well as the usual reports to the Adjutant General's Office, are to be addressed "to the Deputy Adjutant General at Cawnpore," after his Lordship leaves the presidency, until further orders. Any reports or letters of an emergent nature may be addressed, by the river route to his Excellency's military secretary.

The Adjutant General will remain at the presidency until further orders, and superintend the details of the office there.

During his Excellency's absence from the presidency, the general orders, intended for publication to the troops of the garrison of Fort William, will be forwarded from head-quarters to the town major of Fort William for publication, with the previous approbation of the Right Hon, the Governor General.

To the troops at and above Dinapore his Excellency's orders will be transmitted direct from head-quarters; and to the troops in the presidency division, including the departments to which his Excellency's orders are regularly furnished, and the settlements beyond sea, from the Adjutant General's Office at the presidency, to which copies will be transmitted for that purpose from head-quarters.

Renewal rolls of European soldiers are to be transmitted to the Adjutant General's Office at the presidency, through the established channel of the Town Major of Fort William.

ADJUTANT GENERAL OF THE ARMY.

Head-Quarters, Calcutta, Oct. 31, 1827.

—As the Commander-in-chief will have no other convenient opportunity for taking leave of Lieut, Col. Watson, adjutant-general of the army, before he shall have carried into effect his resolution to retire from the arduous office which he now fills, his Excellency avails himself of the present, to return him his acknowledgments for the zeal, temper, and sound judgment with which he has conducted the duties of the department under his charge, and which have fully confirmed the high opinion which his Excellency was led to anticipate, from the report of his merits which his Excellency received from his predecessor, General Sir Edward Paget.

His Lordship is aware that Lieut. Col. Watson could not have continued in this country without making a serious sacrifice of his future comfort; but he must consider his retirement as a public loss, and assures him, that he most sincerely hopes he may enjoy every happiness in private life, should he not again return to his military duties.

MILITARY CHAPLAINS.

Fort William, Nov. 2, 1827.—The Governor General in Council is pleased to direct that the following extract (paragraphs 2 to 5) from a military general letter from the Hon. the Court of Directors, under date the 23d May 1827, be published for general information:

[Par. 22 of Ecclesiastical Letter from Bengal of 31st Dec. 1824.

31st Dec. 1824.

In reference to a question submitted by the Government of Bombay, relative to the extent to which millitary chaplains are to be held responsible to the military authorities, and correspondence with the Lord Bishop as to the liability of the Company's chaplains to martial law, Court's orders on the subject are requested are requested.

2. "From the best consideration we have been able to apply to the several documents, to which we have been referred in this paragraph, we are induced to think that considerable misapprehension has existed on the subject to which they relate.

3. "When our ecclesiastical establishment was placed on the footing on which it now stands, it became a necessary part of the arrangement that the India clergy should be submitted to the general superintendence of the Bishop, and rendered subject to the ecclesiastical jurisdiction for all offences of ecclesiastical cognizance; but it was never intended to except this portion of our servants from the jurisdiction of the temporal courts, in the event of their being charged with any offences of a civil nature, or any crimes against the peace and well-being of society.

4. "We wish it therefore to be distinctly understood, that the chaplains on our establishment are amenable to the ecclesiastical tribunals for such offences only as would render the clergy of the established church amenable to the ecclesiastical tribunals in England, and that for all other offences they are liable to be tried, as all other Europeans in India are, by the ordinary tribunals of the country.

5. "If, however, the offence should be committed out of the jurisdiction of the ordinary court, and in places where the rest of the community are subject to inilitary law, in such a ease, and such a case alone, we deem it right that our chaplains should be subject also to military law for all offences of temporal cognizance."

COURT MARTIAL.

LIEUT. J. M'GREGOR.

Head-Quarters, Calcutta, Oct. 27, 1827.—At a General Court-Martial held at Moulmen, on the the 24th day of May 1827, Lieut. James McGregor, of H. M.'s 45th regt., was arraigned on the following charges:—

Charge.—Lieut. J. Mc Gregor, of H.M.'s 45th regt., placed in arrest this day, 20th of May 1827, by order of Major Hilton, on the following charges, viz.

1st. For having, on the evening of the 17th May 1827, at the house of Lieut. E. W. Lascelles, of H.M.'s 45th regt., persisted in interrogating Lieut and Brev. Capt. Rich. Rose, of the same corps (a member of a General Court-Martial then sitting), in a most improper manner, regarding what had occurred that morning in court, on board the Alexander transport, and continuing such unwarrantable conduct, though repeatedly requested by Lieut. and Brev. Capt. Rich. Rose to desist.

2d. For having, on the same evening, and at the same place, grossly insulted Lieut. and Brev. Capt. Rose, by kicking, or attempting to kick him, and for having, at the same time, called Lieut. and Brev. Capt. Rich. Rose a blackguard.

3d. For having, after the above stated gross insult, challenged Lieut, and Brev. Capt. Rich. Rose, his senior officer, and Capt. Rich. Rose, his senior officer, and member of a General Court-Martial, to meet him, Lieut. Jas. McGregor, immediately: such conduct being contrary to the Articles of War, subversive of good order and military discipline, and disgraceful and unbecoming the character of an officer and a gentleman.

Upon which charges the court came to the following decision:—

Finding and Sentence.—The court, having maturely considered the evidence against the prisoner, with what he has urged in his defence, is of opinion, that he is guilty of the whole and every part of the charges preferred against him, which being in breach of the Articles of War, do, under authority thereof, sentence him, the prisoner, Lieut. James McGregor, of H.M.'s 45th regt., to be cashiered.

Recommendation.—The court have performed a most painful part of its duty, but taking the whole of the circumstances of the prisoner's case into consideration, as appears upon the face of the proceedings, most bumbly begs leave to recommend the prisoner in the strongest manner, as an object of lenity to his Exc. the Right Hon, the Commander-in-chief in India.

Approved and confirmed, (Signed) COMBERMERE, General.

Commander-in-chief.

Remarks by the Right Hon, the Commander-in-chief in India.

The charges upon which Mr. McGregor has been tried and convicted are of a nature which precludes the Commander-inchief from mitigating the penalty which has been justly awarded. His Excellency. however, cannot refrain from acknowledging that this unfortunate officer was drawn into a commission of the very serious offence by the injudicious and extraordinary proceeding of a court-martial. then sitting for the trial of another officer, and that the insinuations conveyed, as well as the irritating language used towards the prisoner, were sufficient to excite to violence a mind more temperate and less perturbed than Mr. McGregor appears, by the evidence, to possess. These circumstances connected with the strong recommendation of the court, and the fact of Mr. McGregor having a wife and family solely dependent for their bread on his commission, will induce his Excellency to solicit his Majesty to be graciously pleased to permit him to receive the value of a lieutenancy of infantry.

Lieut. McGregor will be struck off the strength of the army from the day on which this order may be communicated to him by the Major of brigade, King's troops, who will notify the same to the Adjutant General of His Majesty's force, the Military Secretary, and the officer commanding the 45th Foot, and he will then be delivered over to the Town-Major to be provided with a passage to England. The foregoing order is to be entered in the General Order Book, and read at the head of every regiment in His Majesty's service in India.

CIVIL APPOINTMENTS.

Territorial Department.

Oct. 5. Mr. A. Spiers, head assistant to secretary to Board of Revenue for Central Provinces.

26. The Hon. R. Forbes, assistant to magistrate and to collector of Midnapore.

Mr. D. Home, assistant to secretary to Board of Revenue in Western Provinces.

Nov. 8. Mi. D. Home, assistant to magistrate and to collector of Goruckpore.

Political Department.

Oct. 19. Mr. G. T. Lushington, extra assistant to secretary to Government in Persian department.

Judicial Department.

Oct. 18. Mr. H. Armstrong, register of Zillah Court at Mirzapore.

25. Mr. T. G. Vibart, judge and magistrate of Rajeshahye.

Mr. W. Blackburns, ditto ditto of Juanpore. Nov. 1. Mr. J. F. Ellerton, judge and magistrate of Dinagepore. Mr. C. Bury, register of Zillah Court of Sylhet.

General Department.

 $N_{\theta}v$ . 1. Mr. George Stockwell, postmaster general.

Mr. Arch. Udny, assistant to secretary to Board of Trade.

MILITARY APPOINTMENTS, PROMOTIONS, &c.

Fort William, Sept. 25, 1827.—Lieut.Col.J. Vaughan, 18th N.I., having retured to Presidency, directed to resume duties of his situation as town and fort-major of Fort William.

Scpt. 28.—Maj. W. R. C. Costley, 7th N.I., directed to resume duties of his situation as commander of Calcutta native militia.

Cadet W. M. Smith admitted to engineers, and prom. to 2d-lieut.—Mr. John Baker admitted as an assist. surgeon.

65th N.I. Ens. R. Boyd to be lieut. from 20th Sept. 1827, v. Preston dec.

Callet Z. M. Mallock, of artillery, prom. to 2dheut.

Cadets P. P. V. V. de Breuyn, Arch. Kennedy, John Golfrey, Chas. Rattray, and D. T. Pollock, admitted to infantry, and prom. to ensigns.—Mr. Wm. Lindsay admitted as a veterinary surgeon.

Officers appointed to temporary charge of Pro-Bats. Capt. J. Herning, 37th N.I., to Bareilly bats; Capt. S. Watson, 55th N.I., to Dehly bats; Capt. C. Coventry, 32d N.I., to Bundlecund bat. —all during absence of Capts. Hutchinson and Cox respectively.

Heal-Quarters, Sept. 20, 1827. — Removals and pointer of Lieut. Cole. H. Hodgson removed from this to 56th N.I.; Edw. Simons removed from with to 12th N.I.; Edw. Simons removed from with to 12th N.I.; Ch. Heathcote removed from 37th to 36th N.I.; v. Heathcote removed morn.) posted to 37th N.I.; v. Heathcote rem; W. I. Walson (new prom.) posted to 27th N.I.; v. Stuart dec.

Major J. Dun, 17th N.I., app. to charge of 27th N.I., at Benares.

Sept. 21.—Lieut. Jas. Abbott to act as adj. to Sirhind div. of artll., v. Blake dec.; dated 3d Sept.

Surg. D. Harding posted to 2d bat artillery. Capt. II. Monke, 2d in command of 2d Local Horse, removed therefrom, and directed to join 30th N.i.

Cuncts and Ensigns appointed to do duty. Cornets Baker, Onslow, and Tabor, with 9th L.C. at Cawpore.—Ensigns Ewart, Saunders, Robbins, and Pigott with 42d N.I., at ditto.

urg. A. Wood (lately prom.) posted to 65th N I. at Barrackpore.

 $8e\mu t.24.—Ens.$  E. De l'Etang removed from 60th to 66th N.I.

Lieut. Bott to act as interp. and qu. mast. to 5th L.C. as a temporary arrangement; dated 1st Sept.

Sept. 26. — Assist. Surg. Woodburn app. to do duty with H.M.'s 59th regt. at Berhampore.

Lient. Jamieson to act as adj. to 52d N.I. until further orders; dated 13th Sept.

Justine orders; dated 13th Sept.

Officers, doing duty with Local and Irregular

Curps, directed to join their Regets. Capt. A. F. P.

McLead, 23d. (Capt. H. D. Coxe, 25th do.;

Capt. I., R. Stary, 32d do.; Capt. J. Nicolson, 4th do.; Capt. W. B. Salmon, 4th Extra N.I.; Brev.

Capt. J. Gerard, 9th N.I.; Licut. W. Hoggan,

Sid. do.; Capt. H. & Meade, 55th do.; Lieut. H.

Kirke, 12th do.; Lieut. E. Meade, 55th do.; Lieut. H.

Kirke, 12th do.; Lieut. G. L. Vanzetti, 5th do.;

Lieut. A. Charlton, 6th Extra N.I.

Fort William, Oct. 3.—33d N.I. Lieut. R. K. Enkine (dec.) to be capt. of a comp., from lusty, Supt. 1824, v. Gowan retired; Lieut. T. B. P. Fating to be capt. of a comp., and kms. R. M. Campbeil to be lieut., from 1st Jan. 1826, v. Agnew dec. in suc. to Gowan retired.

Cadet K. J. White admitted to artillery.—Cadet H. Lindesay admitted to cavairy.—Cadets C. L. Edwards, Geo. Hutchings, Wm. Broadfoot, G. C.

K. Hay, G. Tebbs, and M. T. White admitted to infantry.—Cadets W. St. L. Forrest and W. L. Trafford, admitted to infantry, and prom. to Ensigns.

Oct. 5.—Assist. surg. C. Mottley, app. to medical duties of civil station of Ajmeer, in room of Assist. Surg. Heynes.

Lieut. Hannyngton, 24th N.I., to command escort of resident at Kota, in suc. to Lleut. Howard resigned.

2d-Lieuts. W. H. Atkinson and Walter Scott, of corps of engineers, struck off strength of Bengal army—former being posted to Madras army; latter to that of Bombay.

AUGMENTATION TO THE ENGINEERS AND ARTILLERY.

Fort William, Oct. 5.—With reference to G. O. of 28th Sept. 1927, the Right Hon the Vice-President in Council is pleased to make the following promotions for the augmentation, sanctioned by the Hon. the Court of Directors; date of commissions, 28th Sept. 1827.

Corps of Engineers.

Lieut. Col. Sir Jas. Mouat, Bart., to be lieut. col. com.

Brev. Lieut. Col. and Maj. Thos. Wood, and Maj. D. McLeod, to be lieut. colonels.

Capt. Rich. Tickell, Rob. Smith, and Jos. Taylor, to be majors.

lst-Lieuts. Arch. Irvine, Thos. Warlow, Edm. Swetenhain, E. J. Smith, H. De Bude, W. R. Fitzgerald, Geo. Thomson, and Thomas Prinsep, to be captains.

2d-Lieuts. G. B. Tromenhere and W. H. Graham, to be first lieuts.

2d-Lieuts. W. M. Smyth, S. B. Hare, C. B. P. Alcock, F. W. Clement, W. E. Baker, and C. S. Guthrle, to be lieuts., relative rank to be adjusted hereafter.

Regiment of Artillery.

Lieut. Col. M. W. Brown to be lieut. col. com. Majors J. P. Boileau and W. S. Whish, to be lieut. colonels.

Capts. C. H. Campbell, Wm. Curphey, and H. L. Playfair, to be majors.

Brev. Capt. and Ist-Lieuts. G. R. Crawfurd, H. Delafosse, G. R. Scott, R. B. Wilson, J. Johnson, T. A. Vaurenen, R. S. B. Morland, and W. Geddes, to be captains.

2d. Lieuts. Fred. Grote, Ambr. Cardew, G. H. Swinley, W. F. J. Hodgson, Geo. Ellis, F. R. Bazeley, Jas. Abbott, F. B. Bolleau, Fred. Gairskell, J. D. Shakespear, G. D. Scott, G. T. Graham, F. K. Duncan, E. D'A. Todd, T. Edw. Sage, J. H. Daniell, A. P. Begbie, and Edm. Buckle, to be 1st-licuts.

Head-Quarters, Sept. 28.-Ens. C. Pattenson removed from 24th, and posted to 4th N.I.

Lleut. Parker to act as adj. to 6th L.C. during absence on duty of Lieut. Watt; date 9th Aug.

Oct. 1.—Cornets posted to Regts. E. K. Money to 2d L.C. at Muttra; H. H. Christian, 7th do., at Kurnaul.

Kurnaul.

Ensigne posted to Regis. J. T. Wilcox to 49th
N.I., at Mirzapore. J. H. Beek to 24th do., at Bhopalpore. W. F. Alexander to 50th do., at Allahabad. Thos. Riddell to 60th do., at Allahabad. Thos. Riddell to 60th do., at Meerut.
W. Hore to 18th do., at Agra. Thos. Young to 40th do., at Dinapore. P. Mainwaring to 33d do., at Nusseerabad. H. P. Welford to 30th do., at Cuttack. W. Carnegy to 15th do., at Allyghurh.
W. M. Maule to 11th do., at Kurnaul. Arch.
Cowpar to 59th do., at Barrackpore. R. Mogleson to 52d do., at Chittagong.

Oct. 2.—Artillery. Lieut. A. Abbott to be adj. to Kurnaul div. of Artillery, v. Blake dec.

5th I.C. Lieut. John Bott to be interp. and qu. mast., v. Oldfield resigned.

20th N.I. Lieut. J. H. Craigle to be adj., v. Douglas dec.

37th N.I. Lieut. H. B. Smith to be interp. and qu. mas., v. Grifflths prom.

55th N.I. Licut Jas. Awdry to be interp. and qu. mast., v. Simpson resigned.

58th N.I. Lieut. J. C. Lumadaine to be interp.

and qu. mast., v. Robe, whose app. has not taken Campore Prov. Bat. Lieut. F. Trimmer, 50th N.I., to be adj., v. Chitty dec.

Benares Prov. Bat. Lieut. Jas. Hay, 40th N.I., to act as adj. during absence of Lieut. Orr.

Lieut. W. G. J. Robe, 58th N.I., directed to continue with Bundelcund Prov. Bat. as adj.

Oct. 3.—Ens. C. Windsor removed from 30th, and posted to 53d N.I.

Fort William, Oct. 5.—Assist. Surg. Jas. Innes app. to medical duties of civil station of Bhaugulpore, v. Macra.—Assist. Surg. J. M. Macra to be surg. to residency at Khatmandhoo, v. Innes.

Mr. John Logan admitted as an assist. surg-of the John Logan admitted as an assist surg.

Oct. 9—Cadet C. V. Bazett admitted to cavalry, and prom. to cornet.—Cadets E. W. Ravenscroft, W. E. Warden, G. O'B. Ottey, and Wm. Nisbett
admitted to infantry, and prom. to ensigns.

Oct. 10.—Surg. R. Tytler placed at disposal of Commander-in-chief.

Oct. 12.-67th N.I. Ens. Wm. Cole to be lieut. from 2d Oct. 1827, v. Smith dec.

Assist. Surg. Alex. Scott to be surg. from 22d Sept. 1827, v. Reddie dec.

Cadets of Artillery Edw. Christie and K. J. White prom. to 2d-heuts.

Head-Quarters, Oct. 6.—Cadet II. Lindesay app. to do duty with 6th L.C. at Sultanpore, Benares.

to do duty with 6th L.C. at Sultanpore, Benares.

Ensigns (scently admitted) appointed to do duty.
C. Windsor (former admission), with 53d N.I., at Barelly. C. L. Edwards, 48th do., Neemutch.
G. Hutchings, 1st Extra N.I., Mhow. W. Broadfoot, 1st Europ. regt, Agra. G.C. K. Hay, 13th
N.I., Allahabad. G. Tebbs, 12th do., Nusseerabad. P. P. V. V. De Bruyn, 6th do., Agra. A.
Kennedy, 67th do., Dimapore. J. Godfrey, 43d do., Benares. C. Rattray, 46th do., Dinapore.
D. T. Poliock, 6th Extra do., Mulye. M. T.,
White, 43d N.I., Benares. W. St. L. Forrest,
67th do., Dinapore. W. L. Trafford, 33th do.,
Meerut. R. Morrison, 53d do., Chittagong.
Lieut. Col. Becher, 10th L.C., to be pressident of Lieut. Col. Becher, 10th L.C., to be president of arsenal committee, in room of Lieut. Col. Com-Hopper, of artillery, relieved from that duty.

of artillery, to be a Lieut. Col. A. Lindsay, of member of arsenal committee.

Oct. 8.—Brigadier Sleigh app. to inspect whole cavairy regiments on this estab. during present cold season.

Lieut. Col. Ward directed to resume command of 1st Europ. regt.

Assist. Surg. Dollard directed to do duty with 1st brig. Horse Artillery.

Lieut. McMurdo to act as interp. and qu. mast. to 33d N.I. during indisposition of Lleut. Rid-dell; dated 6th July 1927.

Assist. Surg. Morrice to relieve Surg. Hough in medical charge of 36th N.I.; dated 22d Sept. 1827.

Assist. Surg. Duncan app. to medical charge of 41st N.L on departure of Assist. Surg. Paxton on general leave; dated 15th Sept. 1827.

Lieut. and Adj. Barstow to act as interp. and qu. mast. to 37th N.I., v. Griffiths prom.; dated 15th Sept. 1827.

Lieut. Macdonald to act as adj. to right wing of fist N.I., proceeding with treasure towards presidency.

Licut. J. Grissell to act as adj. to left wing of 46th N.I., during its separation from head-quarters; dated 11th Sept. 1827.

Surg. Matthew to officiate as superintend. surg. in Cawnpore circle of superintendence, and Assist. Surg. Wariow to have charge of medical depot and bazar hospital, and to give medical aid to staff at Cawnpore, as temporary arrangements; dated 23d Assist. Surg. J. Dalrymple app. to medical charge of Mhairwara local corps, v. Mottley removed to civil station of Ajmeer.

Assist. Surg. Heynes directed to proceed to presidency.

Assist. Surg. Logan attached to general hospital until further orders.

Fort William, Oct. 19.—2d N.I. Ens. J. U. Mac-leod to be lieut., from 29th Sept. 1827, v. Erskins 3d N.I. Lleut. J. G. Burns to be capt. of a comp., and Ens. C. Wright to be lieut., from 11th Oct. 1827, in suc. to Chambers dec.

Capt. Wm. Hough, 48th N.I., to be dep. judge adv. gen. to permanent staff of Sirhind div. of army (new appointment).

Head-Quarters, Oct. 11.—2d Local Horse. Lieut. R. F. Dougan, 10th L.C., to be 2d in command, v. Monke.

11th N.I. Licut. T. F. Blois to be adj., v. Cron. dace prom.

33d N.I. Ens. T. M. Bremer to be adj., v. Fest. ing prom.

Lieut. Col. Bryant, judge adv. gen., to continue to conduct duties of his office at presidency on departure of Com.-in-chief from presidency.

Lieut. Dalby, dep. judge adv. gen., to attend

Assist. Surg. John Baker app. to do duty in Fort William during absence of Assist, Surg. Spens. Oct. 12 .- Surg. R. Tytler app. to 58th N.I. at Oct. 15.—Surg. Alex. Scott (lately prom.) posted to 60th N.I.

Surg. Edw. Muston appointed to 43d N.J.

Veterlaary Surg. Wm. Lindsay app. to do duty with 2d L.C

Ensigns (recently admitted) appointed to do duty, E. W. Ravenscroft, with 46th N.I., at Dinapore; G. O'B. Ottley, 67th N.I., at ditto; W. Nisbett, 53d N.I., at Barcilly.

Maj. Curphy to command artillery at Neemuch; and Lieut. Col. Whish to command Artillery at Saugor.

Oct. 17,—Surg. Wood, 66th N.I., app. to medical charge of European artillery at Dum-Dum-Surg. J. J. Paterson, 20th regt., app. to do duty with 66th N.I., v. Wood.—Assist. Surg. G. G. Brown posted to 20th N.I.

Licut. and Brev. Capt. Sanderson to act as in-terp, and qu. mast. to 9th L.C., on departure of Licut. Malone on general leave; dated 1st Oct.

Lieut. Bogle to act as interp. and qu. mast. to 2d N.I., in room of Lieut, Woodward resigned; dated 30th Sept.

Maj. Hay, 66th regt., to have charge of 69th N.I. from 1st Nov.

Lieut. Douglas to act as adj. to 3d local horse; dated 29th Sept.

Fort William, Oct. 19.—Lieut. Sam. Mallock, corps of engineers, to be executive engineer of 16th or Purnean div. of department of public Assist, Surg. H. M. Tweddell to be attached to Board of Revenue in Central Provinces, v. Ronald.— Assist, Surg. J. Ronald, app. to medical duties of civil station of Barripore, v. Tweddell.

Cadet J. M. Loughnan admitted to cavalry.— Cadets F. Samler, J. G. B. Paton, G. W. P. Gold-ing, Geo. Brockman, F. Lloyd, and W. Biguell, admitted to infantry, and prom. to ensigns.

Oct. 26.—Maj. Gen. Sir Jasper Nicolls transferred from presidency of Fort St. George to that of Fort William, in anticipation of a vacancy on Bengal staff, on embarkation of Maj. Gen. Sir Thos. Reynell for Europe.

Maj. Gcn. Sir A. Campbell appointed tempora-rily to staff of Fort St. George, v. Maj. Gen. Ni-

8th Oct. 1927, v. Wilcox dec.
Licut. Col. K. Swettenham, 9th L.C., transferred, at this own request, to invalid establishment.

Head-Quarters, Oct. 22.—Maj. Aubert, 2d extra N.I., to have charge of 31st N.I. Maj. F. Waiker re-appointed to charge of 10th N.I.

Ens. W. E. Warden (recently admitted) app. to do duty with 46th N.I. at Dinapore.

Lieut. Vetch, 54th N.I., to act as adj. to Hund-pore light infantry, from 1st Oct.

Superintend. Surg. Dickson app. to Cawapore division.

division.

Personal Staff of Com.-in-Chief. Capt. G. C.
Muady, H. M. 's 3d Queen's Royals, to be aide-decamp, v. Capt. Sydney Cotton, ann. to general staff.—Lieut. R. F. Dougan, and Lieut. W. Parker, 10th L.C., to be extra aides-de-camp.
Lieut. Corbet Cotton, H. M. 's 16th L. Dr., to be brought on estab. as aide-de-camp, on lat Nov.

Fort William, Nov. 2.—Cavalry. Maj. Geo. Ar-nold to be licut. col. from 26th Oct. 1827, v. Swet-tenham invalided.

2dL.C. Capt. H. De Burgh to be major, Lieut. J. Frace to be capt. of a troop, and Cornet B. C. Bourdillon to be lieut, from 26th Oct. 1827, in suc. to Arnold prom.

suc. to Arnold prom.

Assist. Surg. J. R. Martin to officiate as lst-assist.

to Presidency General Hospital, with medical charge of prisoners in Calcuta Gool.—Assist.Surg.

W. Twining to be 3d permanent assist. Or Presidency General Hospital.—Assist.Surg. W. W. Howett to officiate as an assist. to General Hospital during absence of Assist. Surg. Grant.

Assist. Surg. J. R. Martin to have medical charge of Governor general's body guard.

Cadet of Cavairy G. R. Biddons prom. to cornet. Mr. Arch. Campbell admitted on estab. as an Capt. T. Wollocombe, 65th N.I., transferred to invalid, estab. at his own request.

invalut, estab. at nivown request.
Ens. W. G. Beck, 24th N.I., permitted, at his own request, to resign service of Hon. Company.
Leut. Col. Con. E. P. Wilson, 17th N.I., to command Raynootana field force, with rank of brigadier, v. Brigadier C. Fagan, selected for high staff employment by Com-fin-chief.

staft emptoyment by come-me-enter. Cadet Mr. T. H. Sissmore admitted to artillery, and prom. to 24-lieut.—Cadets Wm. Baker, Edw. Taylor, and V. F. T. Turmer admitted to cavalry.—Cadets W. R. Peurose, J. G. W. Curtis, Thos., Frolic, J. N. Marsball, T. F. H. Pemberton, B. W. R. Jenner, Geo. Ranken, D. Gaussen, and J. B. Murrell admitted to infantry, and prom. to ensus.—Messrs. M. Lovell and E. J. Aguew admitted as assist. autres. ted as assist, surga Head-Quarters, Oct. 26.—Capt. Hepworth, 61st N.i., to officiate as major of brigade at Dacca, during absence of Capt. Fell.

Lieut. Win. Palmer, 39th N.I., to officiate as dep. judge adv. gen. in Cawnpore div. during ab-sence of Capt. Pratt.

Capt. Hough, now officiating at Cawnpore, directed, when relieved by Lieut. Palmer, to assume tharge of office of dep. judge adv. gen. in Sirhlad

Ot. 27.—Lieut. Col. Com. Alfred Richards removed from 51st to 33d N.1., and Lieut. Col. Com. H. Bowen, from 33d to 51st ditto.

Assist. Surgs. posted. L. J. Cameron to 9th L.C.; Alex. Bryce to 1st L.C., at Muttra.—Assist. Surg. Gilmore app. to depot at Chinsurah.

Mugaon removed. Castell from 7th L.C. to 64th N.I.; Urquhart from 11th N.I. to 7th L.C.; R. Tytler from 58th to 26th N.I.; R. Paterson from 20th to 8th N.I.; Henderson from 64th to 58th

Oct. 29.—Ens. W. H. Fleinyng, 63d N.I., removed at his own request to 36th N.I.

Fort William, Nov. 9.—Cadet H. H. Christlan admitted to cavalry, rank as cornet being already assigned.

Lieut. H. O. Frederick, 67th N.I., to command scort of resident at Nipaul during absence of Capt. Robinson.

Hand-Quarters, Oct. 30.—Removals and Postings of Surgeons. Corbyn from 80th to 85th N.I.; Fallowski of Section 85th to 86th N.I.; B.W. MacLedd from 6th hat artill, to 67th N.I.; Everest from 67th 10818 N.I.; A. Wood posted to 5th bat artill; J. Patrson posted to 68th N.I.

Get. 31.—Lieut. A. Charlton, 6th extra N.I., to act as adj. to 2d Nusseroe bat, until further orders; dated 14th Oct.

Lieut, Park to act as interp, and qu. mast, to dautic Journ. Vol. 25. No. 148.

20th N.I. from 17th Oct., during absence of Licut. Brown.

. Artillery. Lleut. Jos. Turton to be adj. and qu. mast. to 5th bat., v. Vanrenen prom.

Lieut. H. P. Cotton, 7th L.C., to be aide-de-camp to Maj. Gen. Pine, from 16th Oct.

Capt Hough, den judge adv. gen., removed from Sirhind to Cawnpore division, and Capt. Pratt from Cawnpore to Sirhind division.

Lieut. Palmer directed to take charge of office of dep. judge adv. gen. at Kurnaul.

Assist. Surg. Brott app. to 29th N.I. at Shahjehanpore.—Surg. Hayley removed from 29th to 56th N.I.—Assist. Surg. G. Smith posted to 67th N.I. Lieut. A. C. Demistoun to act as adj. to 11th N.I., v. Croudace prom.; dated 12th Oct.

Assist. Surgs. James Stokes and T. T. Morgan directed to place themselves under orders of superintending surgeon at Cawnpore.

Officers returned to duty, from Europe.—Lieut, J. C. Tudor, 46th N.I.; arrived 24th Sept. 1827.—Maj. H. G. Maxwell, 43d N.I.; arrived 4th Oct.—Maj. J. L. Gale, 1st N.I.; arrived 2d Oct.—Lieut. Co. Com. Sir Jas. Mouat, of engineers, arrived 3th Oct.—Lieut. A. Fenton, 1st N.I.; arrived 2th Oct.—Lieut. A. Fenton, 1st N.I.; arrived 2th Oct.—Lieut. John Lang, 3th N.I., arrived 27th Oct.—Surg. John Patterson; arrived 3ts Oct. 31st Oct.

HIS MAJESTY'S FORCES.

Head Quarters, Sept. 30.—Licut. C. S. Naylor, 89th F., to be capt. by brevet in East-Indies only. Oct. 23.—Capt. Moore, 45th F., to be capt. by brevet in East-Indies or ly; dated 31st Dec. 1822.

Nov. 1.—Assist. Surg. Murray, 16th Lancers, to be surg. to Com.-in-chief.

FURLOUGHS.

To Europe.—Sept. 28. Lieut. W. H. Leacock, 39th N.I., for health.—Oct. 5. Capt. Jas. Aithison, 26th N.I., for health.—Oct. 5. Capt. Jas. Aithison, 26th N.I., for health.—Assix. surg. Jas. Gordon, on private affairs.—28. Lieut. G. T. Bishop, 9th L.C., for health.—May. T. C. Watson, 21 Europ. Regt., for health.—Nov. 2. Maj. A. MacLeod, 12th N.I., for health.—Spr. C. O. Mason, 10th N.I., for health.—9. Capt. C. Griffiths, 37th N.I., on private affairs.—Lieut. R. Riddell, 33d N.I., on ditto.

To Bombay.-Nov. 9. Li 5th L.C., on private affairs. Lieut. Wm. Alexander.

To New South Wales.—Oct, 28. Lieut. J. C. C. Gray, 14th N.I., for eighteen months for health (via Isle of France).

To Isl of France.—Oct. 19. Capt. J. C. Odell, 41st N.I., for twelve months, for health (also to Cape of Good Hope).

Cancelled.—Oct. 5. Maj. Gen. Sir Thos. Reynell, to Bombay, and eventually to Europe.

HIS MAJESTY'S FORCES.

HIS MAJENT'S FORCES,

To Europe.—Oct. 3. Lieut. Fothergill, 40th regt., on private affairs.—Lieut. A. Wilson. 44th regt., for health.—13. Capt. Akenshle, 14th regt., for health.—14th regt., on the control of the regt., on private affairs.—Lieut. Secuart, 46th regt., on ditto.—23. Lieut. Amstrong. 30th regt., for health.—Ens. Stuart, 6th regt., for health.—Ens. Stuart, 6th regt., for health.—Ens. of private affairs.—Lieut. Houghas, 31st regt., on private affairs.—Lieut. Houghas, 31st regt., for health.—Nov. 1. Maj. Blown, 4th L.Dr., for health.—Lieut. Kelly, for health.—Cut. Primrose, 31st regt., or health.—Capt. Baldwin, 31st regt., for purpose of retiring on h.p.—Capt. Claike, 43th regt., on private affairs.

Cancelled.—Oct. 17. Lieut. Brownrige. 13th

Cancelled. — Oct. 17. Licut. Brownrigg, 13th L.Inf., to Europe.

LAW.

Supreme Court, November 6.

Justification of Bail .- Repeated proofs of the audacious perjury of natives in justifying tifying bail seem to have induced the court to take measures to check it.

This day, Rampersaud Ghose appeared to justify bail in a case, and upon its being objected that he had offered as bail before and had been rejected, the fact was denied by him on oath. He likewise swore positively that he had never appeared to justify bail before in any cause whatsoever. A variety of witnesses distinctly contradicted his testimony upon both points; and on his examination by Sir C. Grey, he evinced his perjury so clearly, that he was delivered into custody and sent to Mr. Justice Ryan's chambers, from whence, after further examination, he was fully committed to take his trial for perjury.

The ensuing day (Nov. 7) another native, who came forward for the purpose of justifying bail, told the court that he had resided at Simleah for 150 years! and another stated, upon his examination, that his maternal grandfather left no issue! The bail of both was rejected.

MISCELLANEOUS.

DUTY ON FAST-INDIA SUGAR.

A meeting was held, pursuant to requisition, at the Town-hall, on the 5th Nov., for the purpose of petitioning Parliament for the equalization of the duties on East and West-India sugars, and also for "the removal of the restrictions on the resort of British subjects to India and their residence therein, with reference to their influence on the commercial prosperity of the country." Mr. James Young was called to the chair.

Mr. Bracken, in moving the first resolution, justified the blending the two subjects in the same requisition; he contended that they were closely united. He examined the claim of the West-India proprietors to a monopoly on the ground of prescriptive right, and showed from the history of the sugar trade that this position was untenable; other grounds he considered equally indefensible. In respect to the second subject, he contended that history demonstrated that the resort of Europeans to India had been beneficial to India and to England; but that so long as the prohibition to purchase land exists, and an arbitrary power of transmission to England be vested in the local government, the full and complete advantages contemplated from their skill and capital cannot be realized.

Mr. Colvin, in moving the second resolution, stated that he was one of those who had not strictly attended to the language of the requisition, and he was not prepared to go so far as his friend Mr. Bracken in regard to the object involved in it, although he would not oppose it. His own opinion was, that the power of transmission placed no obstacle in the way of vesting capital in India, for that the power had been very leniently used, of which his own case was an instance, as he had been twenty-five years in India without a license. In the other observations of Mr. Bracken he fully concurred.

Mr. G. Prinsep, in moving the third resolution, expressed his dissent from what had fallen from Mr. Bracken as to the policy of continuing the power of transmission. In arguing against the impolicy of continuing the prohibitory duties on sugar, he dwelt upon the singular predicament in which Great Britain placed herself by the existing law, in the event of some of our West-India islands, which have been so often conquered and reconquered, becoming again the property of an enemy. England might then, as he believed she has done before, admit East-India sugars on equal terms; but where would be procured the increased production necessary to meet this increased demand upon India?

The resolutions were agreed to:-

1. That this meeting, deeply impressed with a conviction that the commercial intercourse between England and India is susceptible of great and indefinite extension, which is prevented by the imposition of extra duties on the products of India, and by legal obstructions to the application of British skill and capital to the cultivation of those products, entertain a just confidence that the wisdom and justice of parliament will, by the removal of such impediments, give an immediate impulse to the commercial prosperity of both countries, and incalculably promote the general interest of India.

2. That a petition to the above effect be prepared and submitted to his Majesty and to both Houses of Parliament.

3. That this meeting cannot omit this opportunity of expressing its grateful admiration of the unsolicited and often renewed efforts of Wm. Woolrych Whitmore, Esq., and other members of the Legislature, in support of the claims of India to be put on an equal footing, in point of import of duties, with the other tropical dependencies of the British crown, and that the chairman of this meeting do communicate accordingly, by letter, to Mr. Whitmore, our respectful thanks, and our solicitations for his continued and powerful assistance in a cause which must eventually prevail, when it shall have been fully discussed and thoroughly understood by our countrymen at home.

by our countrymen at home.

4. That the Most Noble the Marquess of Landowne and the Right Hon. Lord Goderich be respectfully requested to present and support our petitions to the House of Lords, and Mr. Huskisson and Mr. Whitmore in the House of Commons,

The Petition.

I. That your petitioners have observed with the utmost satisfaction, the various acts of parliament which have, within these few years, been passed for the pur-pose of facilitating commercial intercourse between Great Britain, her colonies, dependencies, and all other countries, and the unqualified recognition of those sound principles of political economy, by which such intercourse ought invariably to be regulated : relying on these public pledges that your honourable House have nothing more at heart than, by moderate and equal duties, to promote the most advantageous distribution of capital and application of industry, your petitioners beg leave respectfully to remind your honourable House, that the duty of thirty-seven shillings per cwt, charged on East-India sugar (while that payable by the sugars of the West-Indies and the Mauritius is only twenty-seven shillings), necessarily has the effect of greatly restricting the export and import trade, the public revenue, and general prosperity of India.

II. That an equalization of the duties on East and West-India sugar would also be of most essential benefit to all classes in Great Britain, for whose relief from acknowledged distress the Legislature has so frequently desired to provide the

1. To the manufacturer, by the increased facility of making returns for the goods sold in India, thus removing a semous obstacle which at present exists to the extended consumption of British manufactures in that wide field;

2. To the ship-owner, by a favourable effect upon freight;

3. To the artizans, agriculturists, and general community of Great Britain, by providing the means of meeting the annually increasing demand for sugars at considerably reduced prices;

And 4. While the benefits of the measures would thus be shared by the British manufacturer, the ship-owner, and the general community, and a stimulus be given to the extended production of sugar in the British possessions in the east.

The revenue derived by Great Britain from East-India sugar, instead of being diminished, would unquestionably be materially augmented.

That your petitioners are not aware of any objection that has been or can be urged to an equalization of the duty, except that its tendency to reduce the selling price of sugar in England would be prejudicial to the interests of the planters in the West-Indies; but if similar objections have been oversuled in numberless instances of a return to sound commercial policy, and if the vast addition to the exportation of sugar from the Mauritius, which immediately followed the equalization of the duties in 1823, has not been considered a sufficient reason for withdrawing the privilege then extended to that island, your petitioners trust that the same just and wise principles will be applied to promote the agriculture and trade of In-

III. That the cultivation of the sugarcane in India is subject to a still greater discouragement than an extra duty of ten shillings per cwt. in the regulations of the East-India Company, sanctioned by acts of parliament, and strictly enforced by the local government, which prohibit British subjects from being proprietors of land, while this prohibition is maintained.

Your petitioners submit, that although exportation of tropical productions and the importation of British manufactures has been considerably extended, still the opening of the trade, which was granted in 1813, must remain comparatively valucless, the revenues of India unnecessarily cramped, and the native inhabitants but partially impressed with feelings of attachment to the British government, so desirable to be cherished. While, therefore, we are actuated by a regard to our own immediate interests, we contemplate, in the concession of the prayer of our petition, the attainment of objects essential to the welfare and to the permanence of the British empire in India. Similar disadvantages to those consequent to the sugar duties are felt as regards rum, coffee, cotton, ginger, and other articles of eastern produce, the removal of which is equally called for.

The prayer of your petitioners is, that your honourable House will be pleased to take into consideration the expediency of equalizing the duties chargeable on sugar and other articles imported from the East and West-Indies, and of abolishing all such restrictions on the resort of British subjects to and on their residence in India. as are calculated to affect the commercial prosperity of the country,

The editor of the Government Gazette makes the following observations upon the subject of this meeting :-

Although we have no objection to give the individuals, who assembled at the townhall on Monday morning, credit for temperate and decorous conduct, we cannot admit any claim to soundness of judgment in those who framed the petition. have forced into juxta-position two objects by no means necessarily connected, and have thus deprived themselves of that universal support, which would have been promptly given by every class of the community to the first part of the prayer, had that been suffered to stand alone. It is for the parliament of Great Britain to consider whether the interests of British India be the interests of Great Britain; a proposition that is by no means so undeniably evident, in every case, as our venial partialities /

partialities and consideration of welf may induce us to imagine. No blame, how-ever, can attach to the British merchants of India, for endeavouring to ged rid of onerous imposts on articles of Indian trade, in the ports of Britain or any other foreign country. But we deny, and the majority of the British residents in India will deny, that sugar cannot be extensively cultivated, unless every Englishman be at liberty to occupy lands on his own terms. We are no enemies to what is very absurdly termed colonization, and see no great objection to Englishmen bolding land in India, provided always that they hold it on the same condition, which would be imposed in France or Italy, or even in republican America, that of being amenable to the local jurisdiction, and subject to the laws of the country in which they are domesticated, and not pretend to be governed by the code of the kingdom from which they are estranged. To assert, however, that this is indispensable to the growth of the sugar-cane, is to assert what is not true. Has not indigo been extensively cultivated for years? has not cotton been reared and transmitted till the markets were glutted, and the shippers ruined? and why should sugar alone demand a different state of things? More than enough, we doubt not, may be procured to meet the demand as soon as the duties are equalized, when the article can come into the market upon equal terms with the sugar of other countries, although not a foot of land calls an European its lord. As to the idea that sugar cannot be grown because respectable merchants and agents are afraid of being ordered to quit the country before their harvest can be gathered, we much mistake the character of our mercantile friends if it was ever seriously entertained by any of their number. They have too sound a judgment, too shrewd a prescience, too solid a regard for their substantial interests, to prefer political martyrdom to the profits of trade, or to cast away the goods of fortune in an unavailing contest with authority. In the respectability of their own characters, they have a safeguard against an untimely voyage to Europe, and it is unworthy of their dignity to put forward the appreliension of such an improbable event, even though it excite the sympathy of those who have cause to dread it, or awaken the credulous compassion of those at home, whom they seek to interest in behalf of their legitimate pretensions.

The Calcutta John Bull states, with reference to this meeting: "the attendance at the Town-hall yesterday morning belied the interest, which we imagined was generally taken in the questions, commercial and political, that were understood as coming before it. We observed only three native gentlemen present, with a very few Indo Britons; and certainly, from what, ever cause it originated, the interest was altogether dully supported."

RETURN OF THE GOVERNOR-GENERAL

On Tuesday evening, October 16, the Right Hon. the Governor-general and his family returned to Calcutta. From the north-east angle of Tank-square to Go. vernment House his Lordship's carriages passed through an avenue of troops, form. ed by his Majesty's 14th regt,, and at the Government-house the body guard was drawn up. As his Lordship passed, the troops presented arms, and what with the number of people assembled to witness his Lordship's arrival, the presence of the military, and the occasion altogether, the spectacle was a very imposing one. His Lordship was received at Governmenthouse by a number of the principal members of the civil and military services at the presidency. Shortly afterwards his Lordship resumed his seat in council under the usual salute.

Yesterday morning the Governor-general held a levee at Government-house, which was most numerously attended. The company were received singly by his Lordship in a most urbane and affable manner. Although the presentations began a little after ten o'clock, it was about two r. m. before they terminated.

His Lordship, we understand, derived much benefit to his health, no less than personal gratification, from his less than personal gratification, from his tour to the Upper Provinces, and, we were glad to observe, looked remarkably well.—Ina. Gaz., Oct. 18.

The Countess Amherst held a drawingroom on Thursday evening, which was attended by all the rank, fashion, and beauty of the presidency.

The company, which was exceedingly numerous, began to assemble shortly after nine o'clock, and her Ladyship entered the drawing-room at ten o'clock.

The body guard was drawn up in the northern anti-chamber, and the band struck up as the noble party approached, while the assembled crowd opened right and left, forming a brilliant avenue, through which the Governor-general, the Commander-in-chief, the Countess Anherst, and Lody Sarah Amherst, ushered in by the staff and the gentlemen of the Governor-general's household, in state dresses, passed on to the canopied space at the end of the room, where her Ladyship stood and received the company.

The presentations then began immediately, and did not conclude, we helieve, before half past eleven.—Ind. Gaz., Oct.

" ASSENGELY, 1: ;

The first of the Calcutta assemblies was held at the town-hall on Wednesday evening, and graced by a numerous assemblage of treatly and fashion. The Right Hon, the Governor-general, the Countess Amherst, and Ludy Sarah Amherst, honoured the assembly with their presence, and entered the rooms a little after ten o'clock. Dancing was kept up with the greatest spirit until after twelve, when the company sat down to an elegant supper, provided by Messus. Gunter and Hooper. After supper dancing was again renewed.—(Cal. John Bull., Nov. 9.

EARTHQUAKE.

We learn that on the 8th instant, at five o'clock in the afternoon, an earthquake was very generally felt by the European and native inhabitants of Dacca. There were four distinct shocks in succession, continuing altogether about one-quarter of a minute; its direction appeared to be from south to north, unaccompanied by any rumbling noise. The weather both before and afterwards was sultry and oppressive. The natives are sickly, and some fatal cases of cholera have lately occurred, but chiefly confined to Hindoos, those probably who have exposed themselves to the heat during the day, and the damp air at the night, for the purpose of attending the festival of Doorgah .- Cal. John Bull, Oct. 15.

THE NEW SETTLEMENT OF AMHERST.

A correspondent, speaking of Amherst, says that his opinion of it, after several visits, is that it is a very dangerous harbour; it cannot be attempted with safety by large ships from the numerous dangers, and the circumstance of the tides, which are exceedingly rapid, setting right across the channel.—Heng. Chron., Sept. 20.

PERSECUTION OF HINDU CONVERTS.

The Missionary Intelligence of Calcutta, in an account of the Tinnevelly mission gives the following statements respecting the persecutions to which native converts to Christianity are exposed, and which maturally tend to check the progress of conversion and encourage apostasy.

"And here we cannot but say a few words on the facility with which, under the present system, such wicked schemes can be successfully carried on. The law requires the judge or magistrate to decide according to the evidence of witnesses. Now these unprincipled heathen can get any number of witnesses together for a few fanams to swear to any thing; and, in this way the European magistrates are made parties to the most crying acts of injustice, contrary to their own wish. The worst under these circumstances is, that the megistrate can receive no private in-formation respecting any case, which, if he could, would give him much light on This would be just, if it were practised with respect to both parties; but the fact is, that the heathen have always secret intercourse with the tasildar and court servants, who, notwithstanding all injunc-tions to the contrary, are easily bribed to make such representations to their European master as they chose; the Christian cannot do it : in this way justice is administered; and we could multiply instances of the most distressing consequences of it, by which the innocent, not only among the Christians, but also among the heathen, suffer. The present mode of trying cases would be right if all had the same principles of justice, or the same check to committing perjury, &c. The Christians have such a check in the instructions they receive: the heathen bave none, and therefore can go on with impunity. There are shrewd and wicked heathen in this district, who actually make a trade of false accusations, who get a number of witnesses together to swear to any thing; the accused party often is as far from having committed the crime as heaven is from the earth; but upon his being apprehend. ed, rather than exposing himself to the risk of being carried 100 miles to the court, having there to wait in prison perhaps six or eight months, while his family at home is starving, he secretly compromises with the accuser, pays him some money, and so is let free; and in this traffic peons and kutcherry writers are all implicated, who share in the spoil,

" With respect to the payment of taxes it is no better: a number of villages have a public accountant, a heathen, who looks for nothing but filling his chatties with money, and does his duty only so far as he must, for fear of being detected in his frauds. His duty is to number the people, to adjust their taxes according to their respective employments, and to collect them. In this he practises all possible skill to cheat government and to oppress the people: suppose there are in a village thirty houses, fifteen of which come under one sort of taxes, and fifteen under another, of these fifteen he will register only four, and let the rest go free, taking a bribe from them, and all the fifteen pay only so much as would come upon four. This was the case with a village before it came under Christian instruction; after that the people were instructed not to give bribes, and to pay to government what is due. The accountant comes next year with the intention to play the same trick over again; the people refuse to give him a bribe; instantly he changes his account and registers them all; so that now they must pay nine or ten fanams each, whereas formerly they paid but two or three fanams.

His registering them all is no more than just: but as the Christians are still men having no clear ideas about taxes, they refuse to pay, and say; 'we have all along paid only so much, and now we are to pay nearly two or three times more.' The accountant has a fair excuse in case they complain, and as for discovering his former cheats, he has many ways and means in hand to prevent it. Oftentimes the people know nothing about the cleats, the accountant having made up matters secretly with one or two of the headmen or owners of the villages. But still more; when the people were heathens they paid certain taxes to idol temples for the performance of idolatry, and other contributions for the maintenance of dancing-girls, travelling sunnyasies, &c.; now becoming Christians, they think themselves justly freed from such contributions; but the accountant comes and demands the same from them as from the heathen: they of course refuse, and instantly they have to suffer from him for it. The Christians have applied to the collector for redress, and he thought it just that they should be exempted from such taxes, but cannot remit it without an order from the Board of Revenue. A petition with the endorsement of the collector was sent to Madras; but ten or twelve months have clapsed and no answer is yet arrived. In the mean while the people are not a little plagued and harassed."

The Government Gazette of Oct. 7 has some remarks regarding the success of the church missionaries in southern India, occasioned by the account of the Tinnivelly mission, in the Missionary Intelligence. The editor seems to think, that the fact of Christianity existing in that part of India excited surprise among the newspapers of the presidency. This is not a very correct view of the matter, nothing, in regard to India, being more generally known or more often repeated, than that a numerous body of professing Christians have existed, even from apostolical times, in many parts of the Indian peninsula, and very little industry indeed was requisite to come at this information. The surprise excited arose from the circumstance of its having come to their knowledge, and for the first time through an English paper, that forty villages of Hindostan had renounced idolatry, and put themselves under " Christian instruction;" and the circumstance of the same intelligence having been long before pretty widely circulated in India, without attracting the notice of the public press, certainly is a sufficiently unaccountable circumstance, and argues little for the interest taken in these matters by those connected with it.

Upon further inquiry it appeared, that instead of forty villages in January 1825. there were not less than 125, in which this desirable change had been effected. All this, when brought to the notice of the public, naturally called forth several questions in regard to the subject, viz. as to how many of the converts were Christians previous to the preaching of Mr. Rhenius and his colleagues, and also, how many Christians of every denomination existed in that district? The inquiries have been answered in a most satisfactory manner in the August number of the " Missionary Intelligence." It there anpears that only twenty-one Roman Catholics have joined the establishment, and only twelve families belonging to the Protestant missions, the rest being all converts from heathenism. By a survey, taken in 1820, it appeared that in the district of Tinnivelly, out of a population of 700,000. 23,000 were Christians; 4,000 Protestants, and the remainder Roman Catholics, There are in that part of India few of the Kshatriva class; the other castes however are in the usual proportions. Parriars and Pallers are the most numerous, but Shanars or cultivators of the palmira tree are next to them in number. The converts are principally from this latter class. The whole of the progress of Mr. Rhenius and his colleagues, in the country around Palamcotta, is to be dated from the year 1822: for although they arrived there two years previous, that period was con sumed in overcoming the prejudices of the people in regard to caste. The teachers were in fact obliged to give up the schools which they had established, so strongly did prejudices of this kind abound, and these they had wisely resolved not to countenance. In the above-mentioned year however, a better spirit was excited, and it had so increased, that in January 1825, 1,100 families were under their instruction. Up to August last they had in all baptized 270 individuals, of whom 257 were heathens, and thirteen children of Christian parents. It would appear that the recent converts have met with a good deal of discouragement from their heathen neighbours, owing to their defection from their old idolatry. The effect of the difficulties in which the new converts found themselves enveloped has had the effect of diminishing their numbers in some degree; but we should hope that at the same time they have ther consolidated the foundation which the labours of Mr. Rhenius and his colleagues have laid. The number of families under Christian instruction, including those baptized, in the end of June last, are stated at 756 families, living in 106 villages, amounting, exclusive of one liundred individuals, who form the Palamcottan congregation, to 2,557 inclusive of children. - Cal. John

LIEUT. KENNEDY.

Letter from Rungpore contain the melancholy intelligence of the death of Lieut. Kennedy, adjutant of the Rungpore Light Infantry. He and Lieut. Veitch had gone out to hunt on elephants, and Mr. Kennedy's gun, by some accident or other, went off, and its contents were lodged in his body. He expired almost instantly, and even before his friend could reach him to render him any assistance.

CALCUTTA MARKETS.

Cotton .- The transactions in this, since our last, have been limited, and confined to native dealers.

Indigo .- The market has been active during the past week, and sales to a considerable extent have been effected at 260 to 275 per maund according to quality, for immediate shipment. The article is coming in fast now.

Puce Goods .- Continue in fair inquiry at our quotations.

Sultpetre and Sugar. * The demand has been brisk during the week, and prices stendy.

Silk .- We have heard of no sale in this since our last, and our quotations are almost nominal.

Metals.-Copper, sheet and sheathing, stock rather heavy, in limited demand, and Slab steady at our quotations. Lead, pig and sheet, on the decline. Iron in fair demand, but a shade under last week's quotations. Block tin steady. Tin plates in moderate demand at our quotations. Spelter, sales have been effected in this during the week at our quotations.

China Goods .- Continue dull and stock heavy.

Pepper.—A shade lower.
Coffee.—Mocha in moderate inquiry. Sumatra neglected, and our quotations almost nominal.

Freight to London .- Still rate at £4 to £6 per ton .- Calcutta Price Curr., Nov. 14.

THE LATE KING OF OUDE.

Our Extra Gazette of Saturday evening announced the unexpected demise of his Majesty Shah Zemin, the King of Onde, and minute guns were fired from the ramparts of Fort William, according to the years of his Majesty's age. The late King of Oude was the eldest of the ten sons of Mirra Sadat Ali, the brother of Asef ud Dowlah, Nawab Wazir, who was raised to the Subahdaree of Oude upon the deposal of Wazir Ali in 1798. Mirza Ghazi ud din Hyder, the original designation of the late sovereign, succeeded his father in July 1814 as Nawab Wazir, but in 1819 assumed, with the congurrence of the British government, the regal dignity, taking the title of Abul Muzeffer, Moiz ud din, Shah Zamin, Ghazi ud din Hyder, Padshah. His Majesty was fifty-eight years of age at his demise, the cause of which was a fever, followed by extreme debility and exhaustion of the vital principle. Shah Zamin, during a part of his reign, was the liberal patron of European and native talent. His patronage of the former was, no doubt, a matter of munifi-cence rather than of taste; but he was ambitious of holding a place amongst the latter himself, and in the Heft Kulzum, a voluminous compilation in the Persian language, comprising a dictionary, a grammar, and a system of prosody and rhetoric, prepared and printed by his orders, and at his expense, and attributed to his own industry, has left at least a permanent and honourable record of his reign. The work has attracted the attention of several eminent orientalists in Europe, as Von Hammer and De Sacy, and has thus familiarized the name of Shali Zemin in countries far beyond the limits of his dominions: a distinction to which his mere possession of the sceptre of Oude would scarcely have entitled him.

His Majesty, we understand, will be succeeded by his son Mirza Nusseer ud Din Hyder. The present ruling family of Oude is of Persian origin, by both maternal and paternal lines. The matermaternal and paternal lines. The mater-nal ancestor of Sadat Ali, Buhran ul Mulk, came from Persia in the reign of Mohammed Shah, and was appointed Subahdar of Oude. He was succeed-Subahdar of Oude. He was succeed-ed by his nephew and son-in-law Sefder Jung, who was nominated Wazir of the empire by Ahmed Shah. succeeded by Sujah Dowla, who played a conspicuous part in the early history of British India. The next Nawab Wazir was Asef ud Dowla, who was succeeded by Wazir Ali, his reputed son. After a short interval, grounds for disputing the authenticity of Wazir Ali's pretensions having been established, he was deposed, and Sadat Ali Khan, the brother of Asef ud Dowlah, raised to the mesned in his That prince was succeeded, as above observed, by the late sovereign, who dropped the now unmeaning title of Wazir, for that of Padshah, or King. These notices are probably familiar to most of our readers, but may serve to recall to their recollection some points of interest in our connexion with the history of Hindustan .- Gov. Gaz., Oct. 29.

HINDU ANTIQUITIES.

The following letter is addressed to the editor of the Calcutta John Bull :-

In the Government Gazette's notice of the last meeting of the Asiatic Society there is a brief advertence to the chigmatical characters inscribed upon the N. Behar pillars, upon Firoz Shaw's Läth, and upon the Khundigiri rock of Orissa. The editor of the paper inclines to think that these characters bear a sort of resemblance to the Greek, or to the Ethiopic letters; and by this vague surmise appears willing to revive the defunct notion that those monuments of ancient Hindo power, upon which the mysterlous writing is graved, were raised by some strangers from the west.

Without presuming to say a word upon the characters in question, I beg to submit to your readers a remark, which, if duly weighed, will, I think, prevail with candid critics to leave the glory of the monuments in question with the Hindoos until, at least, something like evidence has been produced that the writing engraved on them is decidedly not Indian.

The monuments are scattered over the vast extent of one-half of Iudia, and are in general, at least the N. Behar pillars are, of such a structure as could be achieved only by an unlimited command of labour and of money.

Now it seems to me evident that no individual could undertake such works, and not less clear that no government which had not continued in long and secure possession of the country, would dream of such an unprofitable application of its resources. But I ask, what shadow of evidence is there that any dynasty from the remote west, prior to the Mahomedans, long and securely swayed the sceptre of half India? I answer none; and I infer, therefore, that these monuments must necessarily have been raised by Indian monarchs, with the aid of their native subjects.

The immediate neighbours of the Hindoes have ever been the Chinese, the Persians, and the vast Tartaric family. these our knowledge peremptorily forbids us to ascribe the monuments and inscriptions in question; so that if we will wander abroad in search of their authors, we must go to the ancient Egyptians, Chaldeans, or Phænicians: and certainly, so far as the judgment of the eye deserves attention, commend me to the identities discoverable or imaginable between the characters graved on our Indian monuments and those in use among the ancient people of Egypt, of Chaldea, and of Phoenice, as they are exhibited in Drummond's comparative ta-Before, however, any curious body commence his manderings into these remote regions, I would suggest to him the prudence of priorly considering with attention what many learned Brahmans confidently assert, viz. that Sanscrit has or had sixty-four derivative Prakrits, and that all or most of these have or had their appropriate amhabetic characters.

True it is that the claims of Egyptians, Phenicians, and Chaldeans to a literate antiquity are very high; but are those of the Hindoos less so? And do those persons govern their assent by the greater probability, who would lightly import letters and religions into the land of Mehu from the distance of half the globe? General and particular analogy justify us in assigning a religious origin to the monuments which have given rise to these remarks; and be it observed, too, that the central position of the inscriptions upon the Behar pillars, obliges us to conclude that those who raised the structures imprinted the mysterious letters on them, in order to proclaim the fame of the founders and the objects of their works. To conclude where I began-it seems to me wild to suppose that any, save native princes, would have devoted their wealth and power to the purpose of erecting these columns: nor less so to assume with facility that the princes of primevally learned and bigoted India accepted creeds and letters from some pilgrim teachers of the remote west.

DR. REDDIE.

We are sorry to learn by letters from Campore of the $3d of last month, the death of a distinguished member of the medical service, Dr. Reddie, who died of a violent fever on the evening of the 22d, The unaffected modesty of Dr. Reddie alone prevented him from taking an eminent place in the literary annals of India, as he added to extensive acquirements in the higher departments of Asiatic literature, unusual conversancy with the classical languages of antiquity. The professional abilities and zeal of Dr. Reddie were of the same superior orders as his literary talents and acquirements, and would have done credit to that high place in the medical service to which he was rapidly advancing, and in which he would have maintained the character of the service as well as his own. His very retired manners confined the due appreciation of his private character to his intimate friends, but they hear testimony to the cheerfulness of his disposition and the goodness of his heart. Contemplated, however, as a member of the medical profession and an oriental scholar, in which respects alone we have reason to allude to his loss, and which designations we confess we are always proud to see associated, the place vacated by his death will not readily be supplied .- Gov. Gaz., Oct. 4.

CORONER'S INQUEST.

A coroner's inquest, the second within a little time of the same unluppy kind, has been held on the body of a female naive child, who met her death under circumstances which, were they not sheltered by the custom of early marriage among the natives of this country, would certainly subject the party concerned to the most serious consequences. The child was scarcely ten years of age, and how far the customs of the country are to be received, as stripping the deed of Vigal criminality, we do not presume to take upon us to say; but the case appears loudly to call for such interference as may prevent its recurrence, and we cannot doubt that the right to interfere must rest somewhere, as otherwise crimes of the most unheard-of nature might be perpetrated with impunity.

513

It is also, however, remarkable, as affording another instance of the effects of the chloride of lime in staying purtefaction. The child died on Saturday at four o'clock, r. M. The coroner was obliged to adjourn the inquest, and the police surgeon examined the body on Monday at cleven A. M.; it was then, as may easily be imagined, searcely approachable. The chloride was applied according to the directions, and in a short while the atmosphere was purified of every noxious taint, and at half-past four r. M. of the same day the inquest was able to proceed without the least inconvenience.

The jury returned a verdict of Manslaughter against one Gopaull.—Cal. John Bull. Oct. 3.

PARRIAH DOGS.

We understand that a native was bitten on Monday by a parrial dog in a very dangerous manner: the man was taken to Messrs. Bathgate's dispensary, where excision was immediately resorted to. number of these dogs in the streets of late has been observed to be on the increase, and we hope the circumstance will attract the attention of the magistrates. It would be, we think, an act of humanity, however, to adopt a less barbarous mode of exterminating these animals than that in use. Could not the natives catch and hang them, instead of beating them to death with staves in the savage manner which they now do? - Beng. Chron., Oct. 11.

CHOLERA MORBUS.

Cholera morbus, we are concerned to learn, is prevailing to a considerable extent in the native part of Calcutta, and many of the cases have terminated fatally. The violence of the disease, we apprehend, is to be attributed to the unprecedently great power of the sun for this season through the day, and the coldness of the rights, arising from the north winds, which now begin to prevail. This month, so far as it has gone, has by no means been so healthy as it usually is, bad cases of fever being by no means unfrequent.—
Cal. John Bull, Oct. 19.

IMPROVEMENTS.

We hear it rumoured that the continuation of the strand along the Esplanade and past the fort is again in contemplation, and likely to be soon commenced upon. We would again congratulate the denizens Austic Journ. Vol. 25 No.148. of Calcutta on the immense addition likely to be afforded to their comforts, and to the splendour of this metropolis, by the completion of this undertaking; even in its present state the strand is pethaps unequalled as a drive in any city in the world. Dublin itself can hardly be said to possess its equal, seeing the Liffey will not bear a moment's comparison with our own much more magnificent river; and were the projected improvements completed, we should suppose Calcutta not only unrivalled, but in this respect quite unapproachable.—Ibid.

DINNER TO LORD COMBERMERE.

Sir Charles Metcalfe gave a grand din-ner at the Town-Hall on Monday last to Lord Combermere, previous to his departure to the Upper Provinces, and to a party of more than two hundred gentlemen of the civil and military services, and of the mercantile body, invited to meet his lordship. The dinner was unquestionably the best set out altogether that we have ever seen at the Town-Hall, and the wines were various and excellent. Many healths were drank with much anplause, the band of H.M.'s 14th regt. playing appropriate airs. It was a late or rather an early hour before the party broke up; nothing could exceed the genuine conviviality and elegant hilarity that reigned throughout. At length the "witching time of night" having arrived, a worthy member of the festive phalanx that still stood at their post round the hospitable board proposed that a flowing cup should be qualfed to the health of their distinguished host, which motion was most cordially concurred in, and so ended the proceed... ings of a most pleasant evening.-Ind. Gaz., Nov. 1.

THE STAMP TAX.

With a view to caution the commercial community against attempts now making to betray them into acts which would render them liable to the penalties of the stamp regulation, the following facts are detailed upon the authority of a party upon whom we can rely.

Two days ago a respectable looking native broker came to the office of an agency establishment in this cfm, and tendered the sum of 50,000 rupees on loan for six months, at the rate of six per cent. per annum, which was accepted of, and a stamp receipt offered for the same, upon which the broker consulted with another native who accompanied him, and declined paying for the stamped piper, stating that he would be quite satisfied with the receipt of the parties upon plain paper: which not being acceded to, they left the bouse; and circumstances having occurred to excite suspicion, they were traced directly into the office of the collector of stamps. The parties returned on the following day, and after further negociation, they paid down 100 rupees to bind the bargain, in the usual manner, when a receipt for the 50,000 rupees was made out upon stamped paper of the prescribed value; which being objected to by the brokers, upon the grounds that a receipt upon plain paper was all that was required, it was explained to them that the party borrowing the money was willing to pay for the stamp, and that the receipt would, at all events, be as good with a stamp as without it. They then departed, accompanied by two sircars of the borrowers, and proceeded to complete the transaction at the private dwelling house of the dewan of the collector of stamps. A common sircar in the employ of the father of this dewan had by this time been announced as the nominal lender of the money, but which was now refused, under the pretext that the brokers had only been employed to negociate the loan upon the condition of procuring a receipt upon unstamped paper.

3 X rective

Any comment upon the above appears to be quite unnecessary; but the public will do well to be upon their guard. The brokers have since declared that Rainchunder Ghooshall, the dewan of the collector of stamps, was the sole person who employed them in the transaction; that they received the hundred rupees paid as earnest money from his own hands, and that it was he who instructed them to take a receipt in the name of his father's sircar above referred to.—Cal. John Bull, Oct. 19.

ACCIDENT.

A most lamentable accident, we are concerned to say, happened on the 21st ult, within four or five marches of Almorah, by which an amiable and beautiful young lady lost her life.

Capt. Salmon and his family, it appears, had gone to the hills for a change of air, on account of health. On the day mentioned, Miss Salmon, in company, we believe, with her relative Capt. Hearsey, was crossing a sangah, or torrent bridge, when, shocking to relate, it broke down, and both were precipitated into the torrent; the gentleman was saved, but the strength and rapidity of the current, along with the shock of the trefinendous fall, overpowered the young lady, and she sunk to rise no more.—Ind. Gaz., Oct. 15.

INDIGO CROP.

Letters from Bogoorah state that the district had, in the end of September, been visited by a heavy inundation, which had left a considerable sediment, and had greatly raised the spirits of the ryots, from the known good effects which such an occurrence is sure to produce on the indigo crop. A similar overflow had not been known for seven years.—Cal. John Bull, Oct. 23.

THE CHOWRINGHEE THEATRE.

The play of Venice Preserved was represented at this theatre on Friday, November 2d: we subjoin the reports given by two newspapers of the performance:—

Otway's tragedy of Venice Preserved was performed on Friday night at the Chowringhee Theatre, and was, on the whole, one of the most successful representations we have witnessed on those boards for a long time. The house, though not crowded, was very respectably filled, and the curtain fell at the early hour of half-past nine, amidst the unanimous applause of the audience.—Hengal Chron., Nov. 6.

Until Friday evening we had deemed "the plot discovered" no laughing matter; but we confess our mistake, and the result proves the power of genius to turn every thing to its own purposes, and to give to things dark and drear its own genial brightness; for we have our doubts now if Venice Preserved be not one of the most finished comedies of the English stage. Altogether, with a few exceptions, Venice Preserved was one of the most deliberate murders we have ever seen on the Chowringhee We seldom write in the strain we boards. have indulged in on the present occasion; but such was the character of the performance, taken all in all, that we could not conscientiously do otherwise. - India Gaz., Nov. 5.

The "Castle Spectre" was performed on Friday evening at Chowringhee Theatre, to an audience which has never been exceeded in numbers or fashion; in fact, the house was crowded to the very standing places. As had been announced in the papers of the presidency, the Right Hon. Earl Amherst, the Countess, and Lady Sarah Amherst, honoured the house with their presence, as did also the members of council, and many other distinguished individuals. About seven o'clock the Right Hon. the Governor-general with his Lordship's family and suite made their entrée, and were greeted on this, their first appearance at the theatre since their return to the presidency, with three distinct rounds of applause, the audience standing, and the orchestra playing God Save the King. Beng. Hurk., Oct. 22.

NATIVE PAPERS.

(Mr. Dunn.)—This gentleman, late a merchant, residing at Delhi, has bequeathed his property to the different seminaries established in Calcutta or elsewhere, after the decease of his wife, who is to enjoy the interest of it during her life.—Samachar Derpan.

Abandonment of Relatives.—We understand that the grievous annoyance to which we adverted last week, with respect to the prohibition of the Hindoos conveying their dying relatives to the river side, is removed, the order being abandoned, and that no one will meet with any obstruction to his conveying the dying persons to what spot he pleaves. We are unable to describe the joy this has afforded to the Hindu population.—Sambad Timira Nasak.

Christian Morals.—"To the Editor." On Wednesday last an affray took place at Mirzapore between two of the Christians, a man and a woman, in which the former beat the latter severely. She applied, streaming with blood, to the thanna, and the thannadar seized the culprit, and sent him to the magistrate: thus far we have heard. If this is the manner in which Christians subdue their evil passions, then what is preached on the highways, that people having overcome them should become Christians, is all mere pretence. "A Reader."—Ibid.

Phenomenon.—Advices of a wonderful phenomenon were received at Poona of heavy rain at Nagar, in Khandesh, having been followed by drops of blood from the skies. In several places hail-stones weighing half a seer each (about a pound) had fallen.—Jami Jehan Numa.

Maharaja Holkar.—A Brahman woman lately complained to the raja that her hushand had been in the service of Madho Rio; but for two years, having lost all his property at play, he had not been heard of; that her only means of living were the sustenance granted by Madho Rao, and that her daughter was marriageable. Orders were given to Retna Rao to give 500 rupees to his gumashta, and inquire what further was necessary.—Ibul.

The Ganges.—We learned from Benares that the Ganges has risen there higher this year than in any year since 1752. The water extended to Indradyumna and the Matsyodara Tank, and for three or four days Bhairo Bazar was completely inundated.—Utlanta Martanda.

Jaypur .- On the 25th of September the Maharaja and Dowager Rani travelled part of the night to the fort of Amir. On the 27th, at midnight, after beginning the celebration of the Ashtami, his highness set off and travelled three coss on his return to Jaypur. On the 28th the sunts and mahants were collected, and worship offered to the horses, and presents made to the grooms. On the afternoon of the same day the political agent and all the officers of the court made offerings on the occasion of the approach of the Dashera; and the Maharaja, with the agent and his court, repaired to Bhimnivas to offer worship to the elephants, the horses, the state palankeens, and other insignia and military weapons, after which the resident took leave; whilst the raja went to Jaybagh to the mela, and to worship the kujhra tree, and receive the usual benedictions before returning to the palace.—
Jani Jchan Numa.

THE NATIVE PRESS.

The editors of the native papers of Calcutta are entitled to much credit for their candour, and for the ingenious simplicity with which they confess how little benefit they derive from their speculations. One Persian paper has been long abandoned through want of support, and we apprehend the Hindi paper, the Udanta Martanda, does not meet with that encouragement which it deserves. The native community, it is clear, continues insensible to the importance of periodical illumination, and the European portion of the society takes no real interest in its dissemination through the local dialects. Paragraphing is cheap patronage; but the native press evidently does not thrive upon such insubstantial fare as declamatory anticipations of the marvellous effects it is The Udanta Martanda has to produce. been rather irregular of late, and in the last number the editor, to apologize for the irregularity, tells a piteous story of the seizure of his property, and the seals of court having been put upon his printing materials for arrears of rent to the amount of eighty rupees. In adverting to a private grief, however, if the interests of the editor of a newspaper be not a public concern, we may take occasion to notice a question of general interest to the native inhabitants of Calcutta, and we think it not unlikely that the manner in which the sentence of the law is sometimes enforced, in cases of this description, requires some attention on the part of the competent authorities. Bengali letter on the subject was addressed to us a short time ago, which has since appeared in the Samachar Chandrika, and will be found amongst the extracts from the native papers. There may be some exaggeration, and some personal feeling in the statement; but when the habits and characters of the natives are taken into consideration, it is not impossible that the ill-understood processes of English law may be converted into excuses for extortion and oppression on the part of those by whom they are carried into effect. -Cal. Gov. Gaz., Oct. 25.

The following is the letter referred to.

To the Editor of the Government Gazette.

Passing to-day along Bans Tola Gully, in the Burra-Bazar, I observed a number of people collected about a house, and on inquiring the cause, was told the serjeant had come to distrain for rent; but that of the sum for which the distress was levied one-third was demanded unjustly, and that of the whole debt charged against this and an adjoining residence, half was fictitious. The seal was nevertheless put upon the property, and if in five days the whole was not paid the goods would be sold, when for a debt of ten rupees, goods in value five hundred rupees would be sold for fifty at most: there was no redress in such cases, and many people had been utterly ruined by this mode of proceeding. Suppose, also, that any persons wish to practise villainy, this is a most favourable opportunity of oppressing the poor debtor.

RUNJEET SINGH.

The Ukbar and native papers contain some meagre accounts respecting this personage, and the transactions in his terri-tories. The Maharaja quitted Lahore on the 28th August, and proceeded to Amritser. Here he received a vakeel from the hakem of Samarcand, who complained of the devastation of his master's estate by the hakem of Peshawer; he was informed that Yar Mohammed Khan had stated, on the suppression of the disorders in Peshawer, nothing had been received from Samarcand for two years, and that a balance of 30,000 rupees remained due on the last instalment. It was ordered that " when these accounts were adjusted, matters would be settled." In the beginning of September the Maharaja set out from Amiltser on a tour through the hill countries, and on the 27th September he reached Lahore. On the 29th he again set out for Amritser, where he arrived the next day. After bathing in the Tarinitaran reservoir, and visiting the shrine of the Akalis, and dividing the sweetmeats as usual, his Highness went to the Rambagh, where, preparatory to the Deshera, he offered worship to the military weapons, and horses, and elephants; he afterwards took his seat in court. The Maharaja again repaired to the reservoir in the evening, and returning on an elephant, scattered money with both hands amongst the crowd: the day terminated with a nach. On the 1st of October the vakil of the Nizam of Kashmir presented a pair of shawls, on the border of which the weavers had woven the texts of Guru Nanak. On the 4th the Maharaja returned to Lahore.

The authority of Runjeet seems to be gaining ground again in the Peshawer country, and which continues to be occupied by the Sikh troops. Moulavi Ismael and his partizans, however, still keep the field. The governor of Peshawer was obliged to despatch a force of 2,000 Kuttuks against Mohammed Hafiz, a follower of the Moulavi, who land waste the country near Jellalabad. The Naweb of Sindh had encountered the Mohammedan insurgents in his territory, and had defeated them. Runject has offered a reward of 1,000 rupees for every sirder of the insurgents taken alive. Advices from Moultan state that great numbers of the Mo-hammedans of that province had gone to ioin Moulavi Ismael. It has also been announced that the jagirs of the servants of the mosque who might join the in-surgents would be confiscated. A body of Yusofzees, to the number of 5,000, under a Moulavi named Gholam Ahmed, had laid siege to Makhurpur, from which he levied a contribution of 10,000 rupees and retired. The Prince Governor of Kandahar, one of the royal family of Cabul. had gone with his troops to join the king of Persia.

LORD AMHERST'S DEPARTURE.

It is said that at Earl Amherst's desire, the Herald yacht, which took out Mr. Lushington to Madras, has gone round to Calcutta to convey his lordship and family to England .- Mad. Gov. Gaz.

SHIPPING.

Arrivals in the River.

Arrivals in the River.

Sept. 29.—William Young, Mortson, from Liverpool, and John Dunn, Hicks, from London.—
Oct. 1. Flora, De Basilho, from Rio de Janeiro.—
M. Enterpie: e (steam-vessel). Johnstone, from Amherst, and Clyde, Munro, from Madras.—No.—
A. Thomas dienntile, Shea, from London; Balguerer Statesburg, Galliat, from Bordeaux; and Lésas, Duros, from Bordeaux; and Madras.—I.M.-S yacht Hereld, Asley, from London and Madras.—J. Joseph, Christopherson, from London, and Geneal Foy, Vedit, from Bordeaux.—
10. Childe Harold, West, from London and Madras.—I. Hongua, Dore, from France, Chus, and Sugapore.—12. Resolution, Bluney, from South America, Othelley, &c.—I. Lord Meleille, Brown, from London, and John, Freeman, from the Manritus.—10. John Hayes, Worthington, from Laverpeol, and Greeven, Allen, from London and Madras.—19. Javabila, M'Neil, from Sumatra.

Department from Calvatin.

Departures from Calcutta.

Oct. 31. Jonie, Bong, for London, and Rifeman, Hawkins, for the Mauritlus.—Nov. 1. John Dunn, Hicks, for the Mauritlus.—6. Louw, Mackey, for China, and Retamia, Gonsalves, for Rangoon.—7. Caroline, Smith, for New South Wales.—13. John Rigeur, Kent, for London.—17. George, Fulther, for London.

Loading for London.

Mellish, Vincent; Clyde, Munro; and Lady M'Naughten, Faith-tosail 20th Dec.

Ellza, Sutton; Childe Harold, West; Royal George, Reynolds; and Sir Edward Paget, Geary —to sail 30th Dec. Kingston, Bowen; Cambrea Castle, Davey; and Cambridge, Barber—to sail 1st January.

BIRTHS.

May 3. At Moulmein, Tenasserim coast, the lady of Maj. E. F. Boys, H.M.'s 45th regt., of a dailylter.

30. At sea, on board the Lady Flora, the lady of Licut. Wim. Hickey, of a son.

10. Licut. Wim. Hickey, of a son.

10. At Moulmeln, the lady of Assist. Surg.

10. At Mearut. the lady of Major King, 18th

Lancers, of a daughter.

10. At Mearut. The lady of Capt. J. Manson, of a daughter.

20. At Dinancre. the lady of Capt. S. Houlton, son, or a daughter, 20. At Dinapore, the lady of Capt. S. Houlton, 11th N.I., of a sou. 28. At Chandernagore, Mrs. A. C. Tydd, of a 30. At Goruckpoor, the lady of Lieut. F. E. Manning, interp. and qu. mast. 13th N.I., of a daughter.

Sept. 5. At Futtyghur, Mrs. H. Bobanau, jun.

13. At Chittagong, Mrs. H. Randolph, of a daughter.

daughter.

16. At Mynepoorie, the lady of Lieut. E. Wintle, 3d extra regt., of a son.

The lady of the Rev. Edw. Ray, of a son.

17. At Barellly, the lady of H. Graham, Esq.,

17. At Batchin, the lady of In. Butler, civil service, of a son.

— At Ghazeepoor, the lady of Dr. Butler, civil surgeon, of a daughter.

21. At Barelly, the lady of H. S. Boulderson,

, civil service, of a son. At Allahabad, the wife of Mr. J. Beatson, of — At Alamanaa, the whe or Mr. J. Beatson, of a daughter.

24. At Mirzapore, the lady of H. T. Stewart, Esq., of a son.

25. The lady of J. A. Hessing, Esq., of a son.

26. At Carden Reach, the lady of Capt. J. J. Hamilton, assist. adj. gen. of the army, of a daughter.

— At Chowringhee, the lady of J. Lowis, Esq.,

— At Chowringnes, the lady of J. Lowis, Esq., civil service, of a son.

— At Hansl, the lady of Capt. Ramsay, 24th N.I., of a daughter.

— At Moorshedabad, Mrs. Burnett, of a daugh-

27. At Fort William, the lady of Lieut. C. Dou-glas, 2d in command of the Rungpore light infanglas, 2d in command of the rungpore ngu, mean-try, of a daughter.

29. The lady of the Rev. Wm. Adam, of a son.

At Selore, the lady of Lleut. J. Winfield, commanding the Blopal contingent, of a son.

At Chinsurah, Mrs. H. P. Blond, of a son

— At Chinsurah, Mrs. H. P. Blond, of a son and here.

30 At Bhaugulpore, the lady of Capt. John Graham, commanding the Hill Rangers, of a son.

— The lady of A. R. Jackson, Esq., of a son.

Oct. 1. At Hoogley, the lady of W. H. Belll, Esq., ivil service, of a daughter.

— At Ballygunge, the lady of Wm. Bruce, jun., Esq., of a son and heir.

6. The lady of T. Scallan, Esq., Bengal Marine, of a son and heir.

6. The lady of T. Scallan, Esq., Bengal Marine, of a son and heir.
— Mrs. C. D'Souza, of a son.
Mrs. Eliz. Rebeiro, of a son and heir.
— Mrs. P. D'Cruz, of a son and heir.
— Mrs. P. B'Cruz, of a son and heir.
B At Mondabad, the lady of Lieut. B. Browne, Bengal artillery, of a daughter.
— At Dacca, the lady of thas Smith, Esq., of adaughter.

— At Rutnagherry, the lady of L. R. Reid, Esq., civil service, of a daughter.

9. The lady of Major H. Maxwell, of a daughter.
The lady of Capt. Mackey, of the ship Louiso,

of a daughter.

of a daughter.

10. The lady of P. Minos, Esq., of a daughter.

— At the residency, Lucknow, the lady of Mordaunt Ricketts, Esq., of a son.

— Mrs. W. Dolby, of a daughter.

— Mrs. A. J. Camell, of a son and heir.

12. Mrs. G. Gleason, of a son.

— At Agra, the lady of Geo. Webb, Esq., surg. is Europ. Regt., of a son.

13. At Cawnpore, the lady of E. Smith, Esq., cavi service, of a son.

— At Benares, the lady of Beni. Tayler, Esq., and Esq.,

At Benares, the lady of Benj. Tayler, Esq., civil service, of a daughter.

At Saugor, the wife of Mr. F. Barthelemy, of a daughter.

of a daughter.

14. The lady of Capt. Bruce, assist. com. gen.,

of a daughter.

14. The lady of Capt.

of a daughter.

Mrs. John Moore, of a son.

15. At Dinapore, the lady of Capt. W. F. Steer, of a son.

Major J. A.

- Mrs. Ann D'Cruz, of a son.
16. In Chowringhee, the lady of Major J. A. odgson, of a son.

At Tirhoot, the lady of J. P. Maillard, Esq.,

of a son.

10. Mrs. T. Payne, of a daughter.

The lady of N. Pallologus, Esq., notary pub-

20. The lady of Capt. Maddock, secretary to the Clothing Board, of a still-born son. 23. At Ghazeepore, the lady of H. S. Lane, Esq., of a son.

At Gya, Mrs. J. Vallente, of a son.
 At Cya, Mrs. J. Willente, of a son.
 At (awnpore, Mrs. Win. Gee, of a daughter.
 At Mecrut, the lady of Capt. E. Gwatkin, superintendent of the Haupper stud, of a daughter

ter.

23. At Chandernagore, Mrs. L. Piron, of a daughter.

— The lady of W. B. Bayley, Esq., of a son.

26. At Malda, the lady of F. Gouldsbury, Esq., civil service, of a son.

— The lady of the Rev. Cyrus Stone (from America of a court before the contraction).

— The lady of the new vy. as a rical, of a daughter.

— At Moradabad, the lady of J. A. N. Forde, Esq., clvil service, of a son.
27. Mrs. S. P. Singer, of a daughter.
28. At Lucknow, the lady of Capt. Geo. F. Holder of a

- At Cossipore, the lady of W. F. Clark, Esq., of a son.

Mrs. S. Smith, of a daughter.
The lady of P. A. Lamouroux, Esq., of a 29. daughter

31. At Hanskhalee factory, Kishnaghur, Mrs. J.

31. At Hansknalee factory, Rishnaghur, Mis. J. Bluett, of a son.
Nov. 1. At Tumlook, the lady of C. W. Welchman, Esq., M.D., of a son.
— At Howrah, the lady of Jas. Mackenzie, Esq., of a daughter.
— Mrs. C. M. Hollingbery, of a son.
2. The lady of E. Wilkinson, Esq., of a daughter.

ter.

Mrs. J. D. M. Sinaes, jun., of a son.

At Bhaugulpore, the lady of Assist. Surg. F.

W. Brett, of a son.

3. At Barrackpore, Mrs. Macleod, of a daughter.

4. The lady of Gregory Apcar, Esq., of a son and bair.

4. The lady of dregory Apear, Esq., of a son and heir.

— At Dum-Dum, the wife of Mr. Jas. Robertson, head master at the school bungalow, of a

5. Mrs. J. Gomes, of Boltaconnah, of a daughter.

7. Mrs. Ambrose Mathews, of a daughter.
9. At the Calcutta Great Gaol, Mrs. G. M. Anderson, of a daughter.
— The lady of John Drew, Esq., civil service.

of a son.

of a son.

Mrs. F. D. Kellner, of a son.
10. At Barrackpore, the lady of Capt. C. A.
Munro, 6th extra N.I., of a daughter.

Mrs. Thos. Campbell, of a son.
14. The wife of Mr. H. Osborn, jun., surveyor,

a daughter.

of a daughter.

15. In Chowringhee, the lady of Lieut. Col.

Mossom Boyd, of a daughter.

— Mrs. M'1Dormand, of a daughter.

16. Mrs. Aug. Perelra, of a daughter.

MARRIAGES.

Sept. 28. At Bandel, Mr. R. Chambers, of Serampore, to Miss H. Fuschal, of Calcutta.

Get. 1. At Agra, Mr. J. W. Chaplain, of the Bhurtpoor political agency, to Miss C. Lyons.

— At Meerut, F. O. Wells, Esq., of the civil service, to Maria Alicia, youngest daughter of the late Colonel Rich. Scott, of the Hon. E.I. Company's service.

late Colonel Rich. Scott, of the Hou. E.I. Company's service.

— R. Wright, Esq., to Eliza, widow of the late Lieut. John Walker.

— Mr. H. B. Gardener to Miss A. C. Duncan.

3. Wm. Betell, Esq., to Francis Elizabeth Ann, only child of the late Capt. Wm. Sivright, of the 8th regt. Bengal L.C.

— Mr. Alex. Dias to Elizabeth, daughter of the late Mr. F. Pereira.

5. Mr. John Kelsa to Miss H. E. Renismina.

late Mr. F. Pereira.

5. Mr. John Kelso to Miss H. E. Benjamine.

11. At Nusseeralad, Capt. Henry Hall, commanding the Mairwarrah local bat, to Sarah addest daughter of Brigadier Fagan, commanding the Rajpoctana field force.

— Dr. G. G. Brown, assist surg., to Catherine Ramsay, daughter of the late W. Fernle, Eaq., Fifeshur.

12. Mr. W. Nix James to Mrs. M. A. White.

13. At Saugor, Capt. Buttanshaw, executive office, 14th division, to Miss Hobbits electrical and the configery of the division.

Mr. W. Nix James to Mrs. M. A. White.
 At Saugor, Capit. Buttanshaw, executive officer, 14th division, to Miss Hobday, daughter of B. Hobday, Esq., near Birmingham, and niece of Lieut. Col. Nott, commanding 4xd N.I.

— Mr. T. B. Timms to Miss C. Pecachy.
 At Fort William, Mr. E. B. Gleeson, town major's office, to Miss II. Jones.
 E. J. Emfir, Esq., to Mariam, daughter of Sarkics Owen. Eur.

Sarkies Owen, Esq. 20. Mr. H. McKellar, of the firm of Gibson and Co., to Mrs. Anne Gibson, widow of the late Mr. G. T. Gibson.

— Thos. Harton, Esq., to Mrs. Emily Dickie.

90. Mr. J. B. D'Crus to Miss C. Eddington.
92. At Bhatigulpore, Mr. John Neville, of Poorness, to Elisa Rose, daughter of Mr. S. Bradshaw, of Calcutta.
25. Mr. C. P. Chater to Miss M. Zorer.
26. James Field, Esq., organist of St. Andrew's Church, Calcutta, to Miss E. Branigan.
— At Cawnpore, Mr. John Meilish, chemist and druggist, to Hannah Olivia, eldest daughter of Mr. C. Comish, coach and cabinet-maker, and formerly of the country service.
27. Mr. W. Parson to Mrs. Jemima Davis.
— Mr. Jos. Albies to Miss R. Garrett.
29. Mr. Thos. Swaine, register in the general department, to Miss Lydia Jane Smith.
29. Mr. Thos. Swaine, register in the general department, to Miss Lydia Jane Smith.
20. Mr. Thacker Maxwell, C.B., commanding in Oude.
5. Mr. J. Heberlet to Miss M. L. Latour.
8. Wm. Thacker, Esq., to Miss Martha Anne Smith.

10. D. B. Werdlaw Fan., to Miss Anne Brodie.

Smith.

10. D. B. Wardlaw, Esq., to Miss Anne Brodie.

14. Mr. Thos. Botelho, assistant in the office of R. W. Poe, Esq., to Ann, only daughter of the l ate Mr. John Andrews.

l ate Mr. John Andrews.
16. At Dum Dum, the Hon. H. B. Dalzell to Miss I sabella Campbell.
— Mr. W. G. Crieff to Miss M. Vallente.
Lately. At Mynpoory, Alex. Chainers, Esq.,
M.D., assist, surg., to Maria Frances Jane, édest daughter of Lieut. Col. Bishop, commanding the 3d extra N.I.

DEATHS.

DEATHS.

Aug. 17. At sea, on board the H.C.'s ship Warren Hastings, Charlotte, wife of Geo. Gough, Esq., of the civil service, and daughter of Gen. G.V. Hart, M.P., in her 22d year.

24. At Moulmein, Tenasserim coast, aged 36 years, Allcia Catherine, wife of Major E. F. Boys, Sept. 3. At Mhow, Lleut. II. H. Doherty, 18th N.I.

7. At Moulmein, Tenaserim Coast, 18th N.I.

At Mymensing, Angela, wife of Mr. John

7. At mymenomy,
Baptist.
30. At Moulmein, Assist Surg. W. P. Blimingham, H.M.'s 45th regt., leaving a wife and three cnidren.

21. At Ghazeepoor, Elizabeth, widow of Mr.
Jas. Elison, late of the pilot service, aged 35.
22. At Campore, of a fever, Geo. Reddle, Esq., superintending surgoon, aged 38.
23. At Delhi, Thos. Dunn, Esq., many years a respected inhabitant of that place. Mr. Dunn has, we understand made actions.

25. At Denny, I mos buttle, 1984; many years a respected inhabitant of that place. Mr. Dunn has, we understand, made several eventual bequests to charitable institutions, in and about Calcutta.

25. At Moorshedabad, Arabella, second daughter of Robert Creighton, Estq., aged four years.

28. Mrs. Louisa Becher.

28. Mrs. Louisa Becher.

29. Mrs. Anne Hyppolite, aged 36.
Cet.l. Matulda, lady of Charles Mackenzle, Esq., civil service, aged 39.

2. At Moorshedabad, Robert Creighton, Esq., of the civil service, aged 30.

4. At sea, on board the ship Childe Harold, on his passage to Bengal, G. Shellingford, Esq., late indigo planter, aged 39.

5. Mary, wife of the late Mr. Moran, aged 32.

6. Mirs. Ann Rees.

7. At Chandernagore, Mr. F. Desgranges, in his

At Chandernagore, Mr. F. Desgranges, in his

7. At Changes negots, acceptance of the year.

— Mr. Wm. Taylor, aged 23.

8. At Bogwangolah, Moorshedabad, Edward, skith son of the late Mr. Chas. Rose, aged 17.

At Comiliah, Mr. Thomas Crichton.

10. Elizabeth, wife of Mr. Mathew Siret, aged

12. Capt. F. M. Chambers, 3d N.I., aged 38. 13. Lieut. Stanhope Bruce, 11.M.'s 3d Buffs, aged 30.

- At Sydabad, Manatsacan Vardon, Esq., aged 14. At Serampore, Mr. Joseph Measures, aged

In the Fort of Allahabad, Mr.Gerrard Ovinger, assistant commissary of orduance, aged 56.

17. Mr. Felix Rebello, of the Sea Custom House,

aged 62.

18. At Benares, James Ross, Esq., aged 35.

20. At Seebpore, Auston Nœme, aged 14, third son of Mr. John Chew.

— W. B. Davidson, Esq., late commander of the ship Hammon Shaw, aged 30.

21. On board the brig Grecian, off Calcutta, Mr. Glibert Hoseason, chief officer, of billious fever, Gilbert Francisco aged 23.

24. At Howrah, Capt. Abel Penn, late commander of the H.C.'s vessel Mormaid, aged 32.

At Tippocolah, Furreedpore, E. T. Bour.

goin, Esq., aged 22. 25. Elizabeth Marie, lady of Capt. John Cooke, 25. El aged 52. 26. M Mr. D. J. Munyard, of the H.C.'s marine.

Mr. John 1 oc., and a god 27.
29. At Chandernagore, Marca Féliccé, wife of Mr. A. Millett, aged 22.
31. Mr. N. Runnel, a pensioner, aged 25.
Nov. I. Jane, relict of the late Mr. D. J Munyard, aged 32.
tames Ellison, indigo planter, aged 48.

Nov. I. Jane, relict of the late Mr. D. J Mun-yard, aged 35.

2. Mr. James Ellison, indigo planter, aged 48.

— At Fort William, Mr. Henry Bailes, quarter master of H. M.'s 47th regt, aged 42.

4. Mr. Wm. Turner, riding master of the Right Hon. the Governor-general's body guarde.

6. At Berhampore, Capt. Chas. C. Smith, 6th extra N.I., aged 41.

9. Rose, relict of the late Mr. John D'Souza, a native of Italy.

— At Chinsura, Mr. Wm. Andrews, aged 24.

native of Italy.

— At Chinsura, Mr. Wm. Andrews, aged 24.

— At Chandemagore, Maria Seraphina, wife of Mr. J. L. Lavalette, aged 56.

— Of spasmodic cholera, John Fatterson, Esq., a surgeon on this establishment, aged 45.

— Mr. John Brodle, late a first mate in the Bengal marme.
14. Mr. G. H. Forth, assistant apothecary, aged

21. Lately. At Ramcollah factory, in Zillah Sarun, A. C. E. Wilson, Esq., aged 27.

Madras.

GOVERNMENT GENERAL ORDERS.

LIRUT. COL. G. CADELL.

Fort St. George, Sept. 4, 1827.—Lieut. Col. George Cadell, of the 23d Light Infantry, and deputy adjutant general of the army, is permitted to retire from the Hon. Company's service, in compliance with his request.

The Hon. the Governor in Council takes this opportunity of expressing in general orders his entire approbation of Lieut.Col. Cadell's meritorious conduct, and his regret at the loss of his services.

TEA AND SUGAR TO TROOPS.

Head · Quarters, Sept. 25, 1827. - Under the authority of government, and with a view, if practicable, to ensure to H.M.'s and the H. C.'s European troops on this establishment a constant supply of tea and sugar of good quality, the Commander inchief is pleased to direct that the issue of these articles be made by the commissariat department for payment.

Officers commanding European corps of H.M.'s and the H.C.'s service, including veteran battalions, the depôt of European pensioners, garrison staff, and Europeans attached to garrisons and native corps, are therefore directed to forward an estimate to the commissary general annually, in the month of January, of the probable quantity of southong tea and sugar that will be required by their corps for twelve months, commencing in the following January.

These supplies are to be issued monthly on indent to the quarter-masters of regiments, &c., and payment for them made by the deductions in the monthly abstracts, through the pay department, as is observed in all other supplies of provisions obtained through the commissariat.

LAW.

SUPREME COURT, October 12.

The King, v. Codundaraumen and others. This was an indictment for the murder of Mrs. C. Bennet, mentioned in our last vol., p. 611. The indictment charged the prisoners Codundaraumen, Chinnatomby, Trevengadom, Condapen, Teagaroyen, and Mooneyen, with the murder of the deceased on the 30th day of March last, by strangling her with a rope, and the prisoner Rookemnoy with having been an accessory before the fact.

Codundaraumen had confessed the murder and afterwards recanted; he and the other prisoners now denied all knowledge of the murder.

The jury found the first-named prisoner guilty, and acquitted the rest. Codundaraumen suffered the next day.

MISCELLANEOUS.

ARRIVAL OF THE NEW GOVERNOR.

His Majesty's yacht Herald, having on bord the Right Hon. S. R. Lushington and suite, arrived at Madras on the 18th October. Mr. Lushington landed at eleven o'clock A. M. on the 19th, at the sea-gate of the fort, under the customary salutes. He was received upon landing by the members of government and all the principal gentlemen of the settlement. The Right Hon. the Governor immediately proceeded to the council chamber, where the commission of government was read, and Mr. Lushington took the customary oaths of office, under a salute of nineteen guns and all customary honours.

The Governor held his first levee on the 27th October; the banqueting room was thrown open a little before ten A. M., and it was soon after crowded with all the principal persons of the settlement. Mr. Lushington entered the room at ten o'clock; he looked remarkably well.

KOLAPORE.

Letters reached us on Wednesday from Kolapore confirming the news of the unconditional surrender of that fortress and its territory to the British government. The whole force arrived before Kolapore on the morning of the 15th ult., and on the 17th a battalion of native infentry, under the command of Lieut. Col. Trewman, marched into the fort and took silent possession of it. This event was followed by the occupation of the formidable hill-forts of Pounghur and Purnullalighur, each by a Naique's guard; two other minor forts were secured by similar detachments, and thus ended this long talked of campaign. We understand that the Rajah is to retain the sovereignty of the country, but is to receive a subsidiary force, consisting of a brigade of infantry and one brigade of guns, which force, it is stipulated, is to remain stationary at the capital.

This salutary arrangement will effectually preclude any further aggression on the part of the Rajah, check his predatory propensities, and preserve him within the pale of British protection. It is, above all, fortunate for the inhabitants that this wholesome restriction has been enforced, for the acts of atrocity which have been committed by the Rajah on his unoffending subjects are characterized by close observers as disgraceful to humanity. The cholera continued to rage with great violence, and carried off nine and ten men daily.—Mad. Cour., Nov. 2.

DEATH BY A COCK'S SPUR.

A man of the Chuckler caste, named Dosseri, met his death on Wednesday last under the following uncommon circumstances :- The deceased was an inhabitant of the village of Choley, and was sitting before the door of his hut about seven o'clock on the morning of the accident, having a game cock near him at the time. A man of the same caste, whose name we have forgotten, happened to pass by with another game cock under his arm, and seeing that of the deceased, challenged Dosseri to a cock-fight; the challenge was accepted, the spurs (or rather the small country blades serving to the same purpose) were affixed to the legs of the feathered champions, and the battle began immediately. After a short period, Dosseri, perceiving that the spur belonging to his bird had slipped away, took him up, and was in the act of adjusting the instrument, which for that purpose he held incautiously in his lap, the bird made a desperate struggle to get free from his hold, and in so doing, plunged the weapon with such force into the thigh of the unfortunate man as to sever the femoral artery, of which wound the poor wretch literally bled to death in about two hours afterwards, without any application for medical assistance having been made, or even judged necessary by his neighbours, who applied some powdered charcoal to the orifice, and bound up the thigh, without entertaining the remotest apprehension of its fatal termination. The coroner, with commendable promptitude, held an inquest on the body, and the jury delivered a verdict of acci dental death, the evidence being so clear as to defy suspicion .- Mad. Gaz., Oct. 6.

SHIPPING.

Arrivals.

Oct. 18. H.M.'s yacht Herali, Astley, from Portsmouth.—30. Warren Hastings, Mason, from London and Johanna.—Nov. 1. Security, Ross, from London, Cape of Good Hope, and lale of France.
—5. Elphinstone, Atkinson, from London.

Oct. 16. Grecian, Allen, for Calcutta.—17. Eme-lia, Dufoy, for Malabar coast.—19. H.M.'s yacht Heraid, Astley, for Calcutta.—20. Lowiss, Harris, for Padang.—30. Dudem, Wilson, for Calcutta.— Nov. 1. Forth, Proudfoot, for Calcutta.—2. Vene-lia, Malmesley, for Masulipatam and Calcutta.

BIRTHS.

Sept. 29. At Jaulnah, the lady of Capt. T. P. Ball, assist. qu. mast. gen. light field division of the Hyderabad subsidiary force, of a son. Oct. 9. At Bellary, the lady of Capt. Chas. Sinclair, 24th N.I., of a daughter.

MARRIAGES.

Cct. 13. Edw. Muller, Esq., Royal regt., to Sclena, eldest daughter of Maj. Gen. Sir Thomas Pritzler, K.C.B.
15. Mr. Escolastico D'Rozario to Miss Louisa Thompson.

Bomban.

MILITARY APPOINTMENTS. PROMOTIONS, &c.

Bombay Castle, Oct. 11, 1827.—Ens. II. S. Guntar removed, at his own request, from 2d Europ. Regt. to 20th N.I.

Surg. Jas. Orton to be garrison surg. at Tannah, v. Hathway proceeding to Europe.

Oct. 13.—Assist. Surg. Buddo to perform medical duties of H.C.'s cruiser Ternate. Oct. 15 .- 7th N.J. Ens. G. B. Lloyd to be lieut.

v. Richardson dec.; dated 8th Oct. 1827.

15th N.I. Lieut. W. Wilkie to be capt., and Ens. J. E. Falkney to be lieut., in suc. to Edsall dec.; dated 2d Oct. 1827.

Oct. 16.—Lieut. Col. Salter, 22d N.I., to have command of Gulcowar subsidiary force, in room of Lieut. Col. Com. W. Sandwith, proceeding to Oct. 17.—15th N.I. Lieut. T. Mitchell to be qu. mast. and interp. In Hindoostanee and Mahratta languages, v. Macan proceeding to Europe; dated 12th Oct. 1827.

FURLOUGHS.

To Europe.—Oct. 11. Lieut. G. Macan, 15th N.I., for health.—Lieut. Thos. Graham, 2d Gr. N.I., for health.—Surg. L. Hathway.—12. Maj. S. Hughes, 4th N.I., for health.—16. Lieut. Col. Com. W. Sandwith, 1st Europ. Regt.—Lieut. R. W. Lukin, 16th N.I., for health.

MISCELLANEOUS.

ARRIVAL OF THE NEW GOVERNOR.

The Neptune, Capt. Cumberlege, having on board his Exc. Sir John Malcolm, G.C.B., the new governor of this presidency, dropped anchor in the harbour at noon this day, from London the 6th July. The hon, the Governor, his Exc. the Commander-in-chief, and other public functionaries, immediately proceeded on board the Neptune, and welcomed his Exc. once more to India, who landed under a double salute of nineteen guns .- Bom. Gaz., Oct. 26.

MR. ELPHINSTONE.

A requisition having been conveyed to the sheriff of Bombay, calling upon him to convene a meeting of the British inhabitants, in order to afford them an opportunity of considering in what manner they may best express their sentiments of regret on the approaching departure of the Hon. Mountstuart Elphinstone from Bombay, the sheriff appointed the 5th November for that purpose.

We have been authorized to state, that at a numerous meeting of gentlemen, held at the mess-room in the town barracks on Thursday last, pursuant to the notification in the Gazette of the preceding day, it was resolved to invite the Hon. Mountstuart Elphinstone to a public entertainment, to be given to him on the occasion of his approaching departure from Bombay, and that a deputation was appointed to wait on Mr. Elphinstone for the purpose of notifying the same to him. The entertainment fixed on is a ball and supper on a grand scale .- Bom. Cour., Oct. 20.

It is said that Mr. Elphinstone will leave Bombay the latter end of November, and proceed to England overland from Moclia.

BOMBAY BIBLE SOCIETY.

On Saturday last a respectable meeting of the friends of the Bombay Auxiliary Bible Society was held, when the ninth annual report was read, from which it appeared that, during the year, 8,237 copies of portions of the Scriptures had been issued from the depository of the Society; of these, 3,407 were parts consisting of single books of the Scripture in Mahratta, which have been sent principally into the southern Concan, where they are read in the schools of the missionaries, and many are given to persons who apply for, and are capable of reading them. Four thousand parts of the Bible in Goozuratee have been distributed in Surat, and in the interior of the province. The greater number of these was distributed by the missionaries one by one, after having heard the receivers read a portion of the book. The new edition, in larger type than that of the former one, is much preferred by the natives, as they can read it with ease and comfort.—Bom. Cour., Oct. 6.

LIEUT. COL. SCOTT.

Died at Bombay on the 8th of October, Lieut. Col. Scott, H.M.'s 6th regt., and commanding the garrison of Bombay, eldest son of the late Lieut. Col. W. Scott, Scott, of the same regiment, leaving a widow and daughter. He was born in 1779. In 1793, at the early age of four-teen, he entered the service as ensign in the 4th Foot. In the year following he exchanged into the 6th regt., then commanded by his father, and was promoted to lieutenant in 1796. He proceeded with the 6th to Ireland, where he was actively employed during the suppression of the rebellion of 1798. On the embarkation of the regiment for North America in the ensuing year, he obtained a company by purchase, and continued in Canada till 1806, when the regiment was ordered to England. In 1807 he sailed with the reginent to Gibraltar, from which he shortly after embarked with it on the expedition which made a landing at Mondego Bay. He was present in the actions of Roleia and Vimiera under Sir A. Wellesley, and subsequently joined the army under Sir John Moore, with which he underwent the fatigues and privations which attended the disastrous retreat on Corunna. The regiment had hardly landed in England when it was ordered to form part of the expedition then fitting out against Walcheren. In that unhealthy climate he suffered so severely from the fever, that the injurious effects were occasionally felt through the remainder of his life. On the return of the expedition he obtained the promotion of brevet major. From 1810 to 1812 he remained with the regiment in Ireland, from which he embarked at Cork for the peninsula, and was present at the battle of Vittoria, and all the operations of the 7th division in the Pyrences, and when the regiment so highly distingnished itself in carrying the heights of Ethellar, which affair elicited the particular notice of the Duke of Wellington, and which was communicated in General Orders. He was also present in the action of the Nive and Nivelle, and had the honour of commanding the regiment in the battle of Orthes, for which he received a medal and promotion to lieutenant colonel in the army. He assisted in the operations which followed against the remains of the French army on the Garonne and Dordogue. On the regiment's proceeding to Canada he was detained on duty at Bordeaux, and on its completion joined the 2d battalion. In 1815 he rejoined the regiment, which had been selected to form part of the army of occupation in France. After the breaking up of the army he accompanied the regiment to England, where it remained till 1827, when it was ordered to St. Helena, and finally to the Cape of Good Hope. While there, he held the command of the frontier and of Samous Town. In 1825 be embarked for Bombay, and on arrival took command of the regiment. On the embarkation of the regiment for field service Asiat. Journ. Vol. 25. No. 148.

in Cutch he was approinted to the command of the 1st brigade, and on the departure of Col. Napier for Europe, to that of the whole force. In 1826 the regiment returned to Bombay, when the command of the garrison was conferred uon him by the governor, in which situation he continued up to the period of his sudden and lamented death.

His remains were attended to the grave by his Exc. Sir Thomas Bradford, commander-in-chief, K.C.B., aschief nourner, the staff of the army, and all the officers of the garrison, as also by many of the civilians of the presidency.

MR. PARRY AND MR. GRAHAM.

In p. 274, we reported some particulars of a squabble between Mr. G. F. Parry, a member of the Bombay bar, and Mr. Graham, an attorney of the Supreme Court. An account of the transaction and notes of the proceedings in court, furnished by Mr. Parry, have since been published. It appears that Mr. Parry, in consequence of the affair, has withdrawn himself from practice in the Supreme Court. In his letter Mr. Parry states: " So long as the knowledge of the insult, to which my professional duties as an advocate had exposed me, was confined to the members of the Supreme Court, I felt it unnecessary to break silence further than was sufficient to secure my person from violence; but when a false and distorted statement, bearing the semblance of authenticity, and repeating that disgraceful insult, had been published in the Bombay Gazette, relative to my conduct in a personal communication with an attorney of the Supreme Court, I then deemed it my duty, in justification of my honour and character, to come forward, and by a summary appeal to what I conceived my ' proper and legitimate tribunal,' at once to place the whole truth before the public, and to endeavour to secure to the offender that punishment which of itself would characterize the part I had had in the transaction."

Then follows a full report of the proceedings in the Supreme Court on the 2d July, with the speeches of the two judges, who (as is stated in the Bombay Gazette) certainly did animadvert in strong terms upon the erroneous conceptions of Mr. Parry, and upon the uncourteous course he had pursued towards Mr. Grabam

Mr. Parry subjoins to this report some reflections upon the dicta of the judges, wherein he contends that the blame and censure cast upon him by those learned personages are not warranted by the facts.

This important monosyllable is omitted in the paper in which these details are published.
 3 Y

facts, and that their opinion on his course of proceeding is altogether extra-judicial. He then gives a statement at some length of the circumstances of the dispute, which does not materially vary from that already given, reasoning upon them as he pro-With obvious reference to a receeds. mark in the speech of Mr. Justice Rice, that "from Mr. Graham's general good character, and from the manner he has always conducted himself in this court, both before and since his admission, I think there is nothing which throws discredit on Mr. Graham, which should prevent any one shewing that courtesy in addressing him which I consider he is entitled to, from his being in the situation of a gentleman;" Mr. Parry expresses himself as follows:

" As this was by no means the first occasion on which Mr. Graham had introduced disrespectful observations into his instructions to me, I was induced to notice it, and my reason in so doing, for adopting towards this individual the line of conduct stated in my affidavit, was founded on my studious determination to avoid all communication with him, which was not obligatory upon me from its professional nature. I should consider it as a sufficient justification in forming such a determination, to refer to the facts recorded amongst the criminal proceedings of our court, viz. of Mr. Graham's having been sentenced to nine months' imprisonment in the gaol of Bombay for an assault on one advocate; of his having been recently convicted of an assault; and also of a gross libel on another. Of his gross insult to the grand jury, by them presented to the court, on a late occasion, when, but for the unqualified apology reluctantly extorted from him by the court, he would perhaps have been committed to prison; but, independently of all this, I might allude to other circumstances in Mr. Graham's conduct and demeanour, which have produced their impression on my mind. Claiming, however, as I do, in common with every member of society, to exercise my judgment and discretion, as to the limits of my intercourse with others, I think it sufficient to say that I have never permitted Mr. Graham's intercourse with me, either in its origin or continuance, whether as clerk or partner of Mr. Ayrton, or of Mr. Hopkins, or subsequently as an attorney of the Supreme Court, to assume any other than a strictly professional character."

NAUTICAL NOTICE.

Bombay Harbour .- A spire buoy has lately been placed in the Fairway at the entrance of Bombay Harbour, between Tull Shoal and the reefs which extend from the lighthouse on Old Woman's Island, as a guide for ships entering the harbour in the south-west monsoon, when pilots are unable to reach them outside the reefs during the flood-tide. The buov is placed in seven fathoms at low water, and nine fathoms and a half at high water, distant about three-quarters of a mile from the nearest part of the light-house reefs, and one mile and a half from the nearest part of Tull Shoal, and from this spire buoy the island of Kanary bears S. \( \frac{3}{4} \) E.; lighthouse on Old Woman's Island N. by E.; Tull Nob S. E. by E. & E., a ship's length open to the northward of the northernmost pan on the high land of Tull; the Funnel hill on the back land E. I N., well shut in with the north part of Caranja great hill: the sunken rock floating-light vessel. or the buoy off the same rock in the fair weather season, N.E. 4 N., on with the eastern part of Butcher's Island; the Oyster Rock (upon which a beacon of stone, twenty-four feet high, has been erected) N.N.E. ½ E., a little open to the eastward of Cross Island.

A ship entering the harbour without a pilot, should pass at a small distance to the southward of the spire buoy, then steer N.E., N.E. by N., and N.N.E., if it be flood-tide; but E.N.E., N.E by E, and N.E., if it be ebb tide, to give a birth to the reefs projecting from Old Woman's Island; then steer for the sunken rock vessel or buoy, taking care to pass to the eastward of it, and afterward wait for a pilot.

CHARLES KEYS, Master Attendant.

To the Editor of the Asiatic Journal. Sir: By giving the accompanying nantical notice a place in your wide-circulating publication, you will thereby render a service to oriental navigators, and oblige Your's, &c., JAS. HORSBURGH.

Chart Office, E. I. House, March 20, 1828.

SHIPPING

Arrivals.

Oct. 21. Ganges (steam-vessel), Jump, from Cakutta.—23. King George the Fourth, Butter, from Muscat.—26. Neglupe, Cumberlege, and Su William Wallace, Brown, both from London.— Nov. 4. Maltran, Murray, from London.—7. S. David, Richardson, from London.

Departures.
Oct. 27. Competitor, Jackson, for London.

BIRTH.

Oct. 8. At Ruinagherry, the lady of L. R. Reid, Esq., of the civil service, of a daughter.

MARRIAGES.

Oct. 20. Ingram Chapman, Esq., commanding the ship Katherine Stewart Forbes, to Aguus Stau-nus, eldest daughter of Lieut. Col. Willis, town makes of Parkhard and State of Col.

mus, reflect daughter on major of Bombay.

24. Henry Hancock, Esq., of the Hon. Company's military service, to Susan, youngest daughter of F. De Berckem, Esq., of Upper Clapton, Middlesex.

DEATHS.

Oct. 2. At Baroda, Capt. Edsall, commanding 15th regt. N.I., aged 38. 14. W. A. Jones, Esq., judge at Surat. 19. Mrs. Amelia Tedman, aged 34.

Penang.

THE SUPREME COURT.

The court of judicature, established by the new charter for the incorporated settlements was opened for the despatch of business on the 1st November. A table of fees was fixed, and in the course of the day some of the heavy arrear of business was disposed of.

DESERTION FROM A COMPANY'S SHIP.

The ship's cutter with an European crew which arrived at the pier on the 10th October, belonged to the H.C.'s ship Farquantum, brought away from Singapore on the morning of the 25th ult. by the sixth officer and seven of the crew of that ship, who have taken French leave, in consequence, as stated by the officer (whose name is R. H. Manley), of the severest ill-treatment experienced by him and the men who accompanied him. The boat was provided with a compass and arms suitable to the voyage; and the officer duly reported the arrival of himself and companions, and the cause of their appearance, to the superintendent of police, under whose custody they now are, for the purpose, we understand, of being sent for tual to Calcutta, there being no admiralty jurisdiction vested in our courts of judicatme, although, perhaps, more necessary in these straits than in any part of India, and which has been frequently recommended as essential, by the highest local authorities, both of the Hon. Company's and the King's Services .- Penang Register Uct. 17.

BIRTH.

Sept. 14. At Kelso, the lady of Major Lake, of a

DEATH.

Oct. 6. Mrs. E. Mitchell, wife of Mr. T. G. Mitchell.

Singapore.

Oct. 31. The lady of Andrew Farquhar, Esq., of a daughter.

MARRIAGE.

Oct. 10. Lieut. S. R. Hicks, adj. 35th regt. Madras N.I., to Sarah Kennedy, only daughter of Lieut. Col. Com. C. Farran, Madras army.

DEATH.

Sept. 22. Of dropsy, Capt. Chas. Harvey, Nagpore service.

Netherlands Andia.

Papers have been received from Batavia to the 15th Nov. They contain an account of an expedition of the column under the command of Licut. Col.

Sollewyn to the dessas Gamplong and Banjoemenang, at which last place Diepo Negoro was stationed for a considerable time. They also report an expedition to Passer Gedee. In the first expedition, which took place in the end of October, the enemy were driven from both these dessas, which were entirely destroyed. According to the latest accounts the sickness at Djocjocarta had not diminished, and there were about 400 patients in the hospital .- Brussels Paper.

Persia.

RENEWAL OF THE WAR.

An Extraordinary Supplement of the St. Petersburgh Journal of the 4th March has been received, which communicates the following important details connected with the refusal of Persia to ratify the treaty recently concluded with Russia :-

The accounts from Persia, which have been long expected, and arrived at length on the 27th and 29th of February, have unhappily not realized for the present the hopes of peace, which the negociations opened with Abbas Mirza, his formal promises, and the written declarations of the Shah himself, authorized us to conceive. Already all the articles of the treaty which was to put an end to the war between the two states had been solemnly approved and signed by the plenipotentiaries of the Emperor, by Abbas Mirza, and another plenipotentiary of the Persian sovereign: already all discussion was at an end on the important point of the pecuniary indemnity claimed by Russia. The amount of the just compensation, for so many losses and expenses, was finally fixed. As soon as it should have been delivered to the plenipotentiaries of his Imperial Majesty, the Russian troops, according to the stipulations mutually agreed upon, were to evacuate the province of Azerbijan, and retire to the left bank of the Araxes. The money intended to pay the indemnity to Russia was on the road to Tabriz, when General Paskewitch learned, all at once, that the intentions of the Shah had changed, that a special plenipotentiary, Mirza Aboul Hassan Khan, was on the point of proceeding to the place of conference to declare that unless the Russian army withdrew in the first place to the left bank of the Araxes, and evacuated the province of Azerbijan without the least delay, Feti-Ali Shah would not pay any indemnity, and would not ratify the peace, the conditions of which he had accepted. The declaration which Mirza Aboul Hassan Khan was to make admitted but of one answer. As soon as on his arrival at the camp of General Paskewitsch he had performed the orders of his master, and communicated the new decisions of the Shah, the Commander-in-chief announced to him that the conferences were broken off, and that military operations would be recommenced. They have been renewed in part, and will be carried on with the greatest vigour.

Abbas Mirza scemed thunderstruck at the resolutions of his father. This change of system, which he deplores, seems to have been produced in Persia by internal and external causes, which have acted with equal force, by the ambition of one of his brothers who aspires to the throne, and by the promises of support and diversion given by another Asiatic power. However, wemay be allowed to hope that the Shah will still be made sensible of his real interest. Mirza Aboul Hassan Khan considered, with as much alarm as the hereditary prince, the necessary consequences of the renewal of hostilities. He had set out again with all speed for Teheran, in order to induce his sovereign no longer to delay the conclusion of the peace. and the payment of the indemnity agreed upon. Lastly, accounts from Teheran itself, dated the 20th of January, announce that sums equal to the whole amount of the indemnity had been sent by the Shah's orders to Kazbin, and that the fear of the progress of our troops would soon triumph over the obstacles which had intervened to prevent the signing of a treaty, the conditions of which were dictated by moderation and justice.

Details of the operations of the two armies during the last campaign are given in the Calcutta and Bombay papers, from statements received from the camp of the British envoy, and from private letters from Tahreez, which represent the transactions in a more favourable light than they appeared in from the Russian accounts, from which our reports were necessarily taken. Thus in the defeat of the Russians on the 8th June 1827,* the Russian force is described as superior to that of the Persians; and instead of the Russians losing 102 men and two officers, they are said to have lost 500 killed or taken, and twelve officers: the loss of the Persians, instead of being upwards of 200, did not exceed fifteen or twenty, killed on the first onset of the Lancers. " When the Cossacks gave way, the rout of the Russian cavalry became complete. and after that their opponents did not lose a single man." It was reported that Gen. Benkendorff had been placed under arrest on account of this affair.

When Gen. Paskewitch marched from before Erivan in the beginning of July, a body of Persian horse, under Hassan Khan and Ali Mncky Mirza, hung on his flank, and succeeded in capturing a large convoy of provisions and stores. No mention is made of this in the Petersburgh accounts.

* See Asiat. Journ. vol. xxiv. p. 254.

The Russians were repulsed on the 14th July, with heavy loss, in attempting to carry the fortress of Abassabad by es. calade. The battle of the Araxes, on the 16th July, * which decided the fate of Abassabad, by compelling Abbas Mirza to retire, is very differently related in the Persian accounts from those in the Russian papers. By the former it appears that the battle was brought on by an attempt on the part of the Prince Royal to surprise a Russian reconnoitering party which pass-ed the Arras. The Russian party was charged, driven with loss across the river, which Hassan Khan crossed, and ap. proached the Russian line, which obliged him to recross, followed by the Russian cavalry, each carrying a foot soldier. The remainder of the Russian army endeavoured to cross the Arras, but the fire of the Persians prevented them, and occa-sioned them great loss. At length the Russians, moving up the banks, discovered part of the Persian army in ambush in a ravine, and bringing their guns to bear on the troops, they fled in the utmost confusion, pursued by the Russians, who eventually re-crossed the Arras. amount of loss is not stated, but the Russians must surely have lost more than eight killed and twenty-eight wounded in this affair.

The capture of the strong fortress of Abassabad was owing to some Nuktshiwans, forming part of the garrison, and who were well affected towards Mehdi Kouli Khan, a partizan of Russia, having opened one of the gates to the Russians,

Some private letters from Persia state that the people began to betired of the war and insinuate that the Prince Royal was acting a treacherous part. It is added that there is a wide extended spirit of disaffection to the government throughout Persia, and that the surrender of Abasabad might have found a parallel elsewhere. Disunion exists in the royal family, and three of the princes, the governors of Malagar, Mehawend, and Booroojird, instead of sending their contingents to the camp, employed them against each other.

By advices from St. Petersburgh, dated 11th March, it appears that the Russians have occupied Ardebil, and that the Shah, alarmed, has consented to fulfil the treaty. The scene of negociation is removed from Tabreez to Miana.

China.

ENGLISH NEWSPAPER.

We have received the first two numbers of the Canton Register, the first English newspaper ever printed in China. It is * Ibid. p. 515.

edited

edited, we understand, by an American, and is perhaps one of the most beautifully printed papers extant in the east. The type is large, uncommonly elegant, and apparently new. The plan of the paper, which appears on the 1st and 15th of each month, is to present a copious and correct price-current of commodities, and reports of foreign markets, and occasional accounts relative to the trade, customs, and peculiarities of the Chinese, as well as translations from their standard works. The first number appeared on November 8th.

The military operations in Western Tartary or Turkistan, commonly called Little Bucharia, are discontinued, and the imperial army recalled. During the summer campaign of this year, the Mohammedan rebels were driven back from Aksa to Cashgar, and the Chinese frontier on the N.W. in that neighbourhood. The towns of Yarcand, Kotin, &c., which the preceding year had fallen into the hands of the rebels, were re-taken by his Majesty's forces. But the chief rebel, a Mohammedan pretender * to the throne of Little Bucharia, was not taken. It is indeed reported among the natives that he has returned to the charge with a reinforcement of troops furnished to him by the Russian governors on the frontier.

* Chang-kih-urh, the name of the chief rebel, seems the Chinese mode of writing Jehangir, which is the name given to this chief in the accounts received via Russia.—Ed. A. J.

The natives (of China) complain of increasing poverty among the mass of the people, and consequently the increase of banditti; some of whom, even in the northern parts of Canton, betake themselves by thousands to the hills and vallies defended by narrow passes, where they set the government at defiance.

The finances of the country are not in a good state. Hence last year a new measure, consisting in the sale of offices, was adopted, and a price fixed by government for all the different offices below governors and deputy governors. This measure was reluctantly adopted for one year to meet the expenses of the Tartar war. It has produced under six millions of taels (about two millions sterling).—Canton Register, Nov. 15.

For the latest intelligence from China we refer to the letter of a correspondent from Canton in a preceding page.

SHIPPING.

Arrivals at Whampon.

Oct. 30. Marques Hastings, from N.S. Wales.

Nov. 1. Guildford, from ditto.—15. H.C's ships

Windsor, Fao quaraeon, and Astell, from England.

—19. H.C's ships Ingits and Scal by Castle, from

The H.C.'s ships Bombay, General Kyd, and Hythe, were to sail for England on the 30th Nov.; the Charles Grant on the 5th Dec. (vis the Capt); the Buckinghamshire, Waterloo, Kelhe Castle, and Duke of Sweet, on the 20th Pec.; and the Atlas on the 5th Jan. 1828 (via the Cape).

HOME INTELLIGENCE.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

House of Commons, 25th March, 1828. Law of Real Property in India.—Mr. Tergusson rose to present a petition of which he had given notice, from the British, native, and other inhabitants of Calcutta, respecting the law of real property within that settlement, and particularly respecting the liability of such property in the hands of executors and administrators to the payment of the debts of the deceased. This petition, which was signed, he believed, by almost every person of respectability and opulence in Calcutta, complained of the imperfect and unsettled state of the law in that particular, arising chiefly from some late decisions of the Supreme Court, affecting property to the amount of many millions sterling. The petition stated, that previously to the granting by his Majesty of the Charter of the Supreme Court in 1774. houses and lands of British subjects were liable to be seized and sold for the payment of debts, as well in the hands of the owner in his life-time, as of his executor or administrator after his decease. The letters patent or charter of justice, in 1774, recognized this to be the law; for after giving to the Supreme Court the power to try and determine actions and suits of a personal nature, and "all rights, titles, claims and demands, of, in, and to any houses, lands, or other things, real or personal," within the provinces of Bengal, Bahar, and Orissa, against his Majesty's subjects, and against the executors and administrators of such his subjects, it authorizes the same court to give judgment in such actions, and thereupon to award and issue writs of executions, commanding the sheriff to seize, and deliver possession of houses, lands, and other things recovered by such judgment; or to levy any sums of money recovered by such judgment, by seizing and selling so much of the houses, lands, debts, or other effects of the party against whom such writs shall have been awarded, as shall be sufficient to satisfy such judgment. The petition stated that it was the meaning and intention of this provision in the letters-patent, to place. houses and lands on the same footing with personality as to liability for debts, either in the life-time or after the death of the debtor, and that such had always been considered to be the law, and never had been doubted untill lately, when in a case decided in the Supreme Court, Sir Charles Grey, the chief justice, had declared it to be his opinion, that such estates being of inheritance, which he thought British subjects might hold in Calcutta, were not assets in the hands of an executor or administrator for the payment of debts, and that if liable for the debts of the deceased at all, they were liable in the hands of the heir, who was the person to be sued, and not the executor or administrator. The other two judges, however, Sir Anthony Buller and Sir John Franks, were of opinion that such estates were liable to the payment of such debts, and were assets for that purpose in the hands of the executor or administrator, who might lawfully sell and convey the

The judgment of the court was given in favour of such power, but the petition stated, that such was the alarm created by the effect of the opinion given by the chief justice, joined to a decision which had subsequently taken place respecting a claim of dower, that the sale of houses and lands by executors and administrators had been wholly suspended, and that all titles to houses and lands which had ever been conveyed by an executor or administrator were rendered liable to objections and doubts. He (Mr. Fergusson) could well conceive this, for he had no hesitation in saying that if the law was, as laid down by the Chief Justice, of whose talents and learning he could not speak otherwise than with respect, it would go to shake almost every title in Calcutta. In the course of a long practice, in which numerous titles had come under his (Mr. Fergusson's) consideration, he scarcely remembered one in which some link in the chain of title did not consist of a conveyance from an executor or administrator. Mr. Fergusson could safely say, that during a practice of seventeen years, he had never heard, either at the bar or from the bench, a doubt thrown upon the law, that an executor or administrator had a power to sell an estate in lands or houses, whether of inheritance or not, for the payment of the debts generally of the deceased, and that such estate was assets in his hands for that purpose, case of dower referred to in the petition was one in which the Chief Justice and Sir John Franks, the only two judges who then constituted the court, concurred in holding, that the lands of a British subiect in Calcutta could not be sold, either in his life-time or after his death, for the payment of his debts, unless subject to the right of dower. This was, certainly, the first decision that had been given in the Supreme Court in favour of dower, as a claim preferable to debts; and the petitioners contended that by the law and practice which had at all times obtained, lands had been seized, and sold by the sheriff under writ of fieri facias, as well in the lifetime of the owner as (after his death) in the hands of his executors or administrators for the payment of debts, and that no reservation had ever been made or claimed to be made on account of dower .- Whatever might be the law, Mr. Fergusson said, on this point, it would seem that, for the future at least, it would be most desirable that in a commercial community like Calcutta, the transfer of landed property, particularly for the payment of debts, should be entirely freed from this charge, and the rather as by the bankrupt law, the real estate of a bankrupt situate in any part of the dominions of the crown passed by the assignment and became liable to the payment of the bankrupt's debts discharged from all claim of dower. There was another judgment of the Supreme Court mentioned in the petition, which was the unanimous judgment of the three judges, but in which the point was decided for the first time, that an alien could not take lands by descent in Calcutta. From the protection afforded by the British government to persons residing within its territories it was certain the subjects of foreign states had been induced to resort to and settle in Calcutta, and had purchased lands and houses which had descended to their heirs, as the petition stated, without let or hindrance. In the two first charters, which were granted in the reigns of George I. and II. it was recited, that the " United Company had, by a strict and equal distribution of justice, very much encouraged not only his Majesty's subjects, but like-wise the subjects of other countries, and the natives of the adjacent countries, to resort to and settle in Calcutta." This was a point of great importance, and which involved questions of general consideration; and he (Mr. Fergusson) was sensible that if any thing was to be done to alter or affect the law on this subject, it must be under the express sanction of the crown. There was one remaining point noticed in the petition, which was also of great interest, he meant the want of a proper law respecting insolvent debtors, whereby many persons persons were imprisoned for a great length of years in the gaol of Calcutta, although they had no means of discharging their debts, and had delivered up all they possessed. Mr. Fergusson understood that a bill for the purpose of remedying this evil was now in preparation, under the sanction of the Court of Directors and the Board of Control. This subject he (Mr. Fergusson) did not therefore mean to include in the bill, which it was his intention, after presenting this petition, to move the house for leave to bring in. He thought he had said enough to satisfy the house that the law, and the very important subject to which he had called their attention. ought not to be suffered to remain in its present unsettled and imperfect state; he did not therefore anticipate any objection to the motion of which he had given notice for that evening. In the mean time he would content himself with moving for leave to bring up the petition.

Mr. C. W. Wynn said that, during the time he had been connected with the Board of Control, he had commissioned a chief justice who was sent out from this country to collect information respecting the propriety of introducing the insolvent debtors' laws there. That learned judge, however, fell a victim to disease in about six months after his arrival in India, and consequently the desired information was not collected. Great difference of opinion existed on the subject in India. If it could be done, he (Mr. Wynn) was of opinion that it would be better effected by some species of regulations respecting debtors there, than by any legislative enactment here. The draught of a bill upon the subject had arrived in this country a few days previous to his (Mr. Wynn's) leaving office, and he recom-mended to the noble lord (Melville), now at the head of the Board of Controul, to have the matter laid before the law officers of the crown. Perhaps it might be supposed that he (Mr. Wynn) would be most competent to introduce the subject to the consideration of the house, and if that were the case, he should be very happy to do so. (Hear!)

Mr. Hume, Mr. Trunt, Mr. T P Courtenay and Lord Althorp made a few observations; after which

Mr. Fergusson obtained leave to bring in the bill to explain and amend the law in respect to real property belonging to British subjects and others in India.

LAW.

THE KING v. SUTTON AND OTHERS.
(Before Lord Tenterden and a Special Jury.)

This was an indictment against Samuel Sutton, Will'am Andrews, James Patten

Anstice, John Edward Despard, Joseph Tyndale, George Henry Gibbons, Thomas Wright, and Charles Elton Prescott, charging the seven first individuals with having conspired together for gain, reward, and profit, to negociate for one Edward Drake Back to be nominated and appointed a cadet under the East-India Company; and it further charged Charles Elton Prescott (a Director) with unlawfully, wilfully, and knowingly aiding, abetting, and assisting the others. Capt. Prescott, Anstice, and Despard, pleaded not guilty; the other defendants willin.

defendants guilty.

Before the indictment was opened by Mr. Carter, on the part of the prosecution, the defendant Anstice prayed by his counsel to be allowed to withdraw his plea of not guilty and plead guilty, or to have a verdict of guilty recorded against him. The latter was accordingly done.

Mr. Solutior General then spoke as follows:—May it please your lordship, gentlemen of the jury, I appear in this case on the part of the prosecution against the eight defendants who have been named by my learned friend. It is a prosecution that has been instituted at the suit of the East-India Company, for the purpose of detecting, and bringing to punishment, persons who have been guilty of a very gross act, in the sale of patronage belonging to their body.

Gentlemen, before I begin to narrate the facts of the case, I would state to you, that the parties stand in very different relations: the first seven of them being those who are charged with the actual guilt of the transaction itself; but Mr. Prescott, the gentleman who is last named upon this record, being charged only with having aided and assisted and abetted the rest, but not himself charged with being the perpetrator or part perpetrator of the criminal act itself. pears also by the statement of my learned friend, that several of these defendants have thought proper to withdraw their plea of not gulty, and submit to the judgment of the court against them; and one of them, since we have entered the court, since you have been sworn (Mr. Austice), has allowed a verdict to be taken against him. I have no other observation to make upon this, than that the prosecutors of this indictment are no parties whatever to any agreement, or any understanding, or any hope of withdraw-ment of punishment held out to the parties who have so thought proper to withdraw their plea; it is a matter for their consideration: they have thought, I dare say, and rightly thought, that the evidence we were prepared to lay before you was so strong and conclusive, that rather than give the trouble of a more minute investigation, they have voluntarily, by the advice of those under whose care they have entrusted themselves, withdrawn their plea, and suffered judgment to be entered against them; at present therefore the only persons with whom you have any concern are Capt. Despard, who has pleaded he is not guilty of the charge, and Mr. Prescott, who I have alreedy stated, stands charged with an inferior degree of guilt, not an actual participation in the original transaction itself; but with having aided and assisted, or at least, as I think the evidence will satisfactorily shew you, of having connived in this act, when performed by a person of the name of Sutton, the principal agent.

advice

Gentlemen: it will be my duty to lay before you, as shortly as I can, the evidence that will be brought in review before your judgment; and I think you will be of opinion, that there is a case, not only irresistible against the first of those defendants, but upon the result of the evidence, and the observations I shall make, if they shall be justified by the evidence I shall produce, you cannot entertain a doubt but that the directors of the East-India Company would have deserted that duty reposed in them, and betrayed the trust they held, and the conduct of those large concerns which are entrusted to their care, if they had not investigated this question to the very foundation, and persisted in bringing it before a july of the country, to decide upon the guilt or innocence of the parties accused. This observation is the more necessary, because one of these defendants, Mr. Prescott, stands in the situation of being a brother director with those who have instituted the prosecution; and it became therefore doubly their duty it became an imperious duty, and from which it was impossible they should withdraw themselves, that they should bring the case of that gentleman with the rest before the judgment of a jury of their country; for it would otherwise have been said, and I know not what answer could have been made to it, that though they were willing to prosecute those, the immediate guilty parties, who participated in the transaction; yet with a case laid before them, and their suspicions justly excited, they were desirous of throwing a shield over parties who were their brethren in the government of the body, and unwilling to bring all equally guilty to the punishment they deserved. It has, therefore, been determined, and upon the evidence before you you will decide whether properly or not, that this presecution should proceed; and that Mr. Prescott, charged as he is with having assisted, with a know-ledge of the guilt of the transaction, on the part of those who were the immediate perpetrators, should receive at your hands, as the evidence turns out, either a verdict of guilty, or a verdict of acquittal.

Gentlemen: it will appear to you that the first intimation that was given to the East-India Company of any transaction which at all affected the sale of the patronage in question, was so early as the month of February 1827: but before coming to that I shall beg leave to mention a few transactions that had occurred, which, although they have no immediate reference to the parties now upon the record, will clear the way to your more fully understanding the whole nature of the transaction, and introduce one of those persons who is a prominent party in the transaction.

It will be proved to you that a clergyman of the name of the Rev. Dr. Back, residing at Little Hampton, in the county of Sussex having perceived in the Morning Herald newspaper, in August 1826, one of those advertisements with feigned names tothem, or only letters, I believe M. N. in this case, denoting, as you often read, that if inquiry was made at a particular place, an opportunity offered to parents of obtaining a situation of a respectable nature for a youth under twenty to go abroad, but his outfit would require means, without which no application need be made. Dr. Back having a son that he was desirous should obtain some employment of the nature pointed out in that advertisement, wrote a letter to the fictitious character M. N., to which he afterwards received an answer. I shall not trouble you with the correspondence upon that occasion any further than that it introduces to your acquaintance before it had ceased, which was only the 20th of August, the name of Mr. Wright, one of the parties on this record. It seems, however, that Dr. Back being dissatisfied with the negociation, which went on to a certain extent on that occasion, by a friend in town having called on the party in town to whom the letter had referred, entirely abandoned it. However, in October 1826, there is another letter addressed to him at Little Hampton, requesting him to call upon Mr. Wright, and stating where Mr. Wright the defendant then resided, which I think was in Alsop's Buildings, Regent's Park. Dr. Back accordingly a short time after came up to London and called at the place to which he was referred, where he introduced himself to Mr. Wright, not under the name of Dr. Back, because upon these occasions there is always a little degree of reserve and secresy; and having once written a letter in the name of Edwards, he thought it would be as well during the progress of this transaction that he should not pass by his own name of Dr. Back, but by that of Edwards; he calls upon him, and has a conversation with him under the name of Edwards. Now, upon that occasion the conversation turns u on the nature of the employment which Mr. Wright could furnish, and the price required for it; and it appears that Mr. Wright stated that the nature of the employment was that of a cadetship to India: and if it was a cavalry cadetship it would be 900 guincas; and if in the infantry, from £600 to £700 only. Dr. Back, however, having been informed in the course of the former negociation that no price would be required, felt himself certainly indignant at hearing so large a sum mentioned for the outfit, as it might be called, of his son; and upon this communication, which had been renewed in October, he again abandoned all further negociation, and went back again into the country.

It seems he remained there in quiet till the month of January 1827, the end of that month; and then from some circumstances in his own family he was desirons that his son should obtain this situation; but a thought came across him that there was something irregular and mysterious in this mode of acquiring his appointment, and he thought it right at once to direct a letter immediately and ducetly to the Chairman of the East-India Company, telling him all that had taken place upon the former occasions, and asking him distinctly and openly whether this was a proper mode by which the patronage of the Company should be obtained. The natural consequence of that letter was, that the Chairman and the Deputy Chairman, they being the persons to whom this letter had been communicated, thinking it right in a matter of this nature that strict secresy should be observed, sent down a very conidential person in their immediate employment to Dr. Back.

Without troubling you with a detail of what took place, it apppeared fit to the Chairman and Deputy Chairman that, if possible, this opportunity of detecting what they were afraid was too common, namely, the trade and traffic in the patronage of the Company, by guilty persons leaguing together, should be probed and sifted to the bottom, and the guilty brought to pumshment; they therefore requested, and made it quite an carnest request on their part, that Dr. Back himself, an extremely respectable man, should continue in the negociation, in order that he might, of possible, trace the different steps in it, from those who it then appeared were most distantly connected with the patronage itself, and see whether or no there were any persons in the employment of the Company who were themselves participators in the guilt; or, at all events, brung to punishment those who thought proper thus to delude the public.

Now, after this communication from Asiatic Journ. Vol. 25. No. 148.

the Chairman and Deputy Chairman, you must bear in mind that every subsequent step was entirely known to the Chairman and Deputy Chairman, and considered by them well; and that nothing was done in the course of this transaction that was not immediately communicated to the confidential adviser so employed by them. I will now go on to state to you what took place from time to time down to the period when the detection was complete, and shew you what share each party upon this record had in the transaction now before the court.

Gentlemen : after Dr. Back had received this information, he writes a letter to Mr. Wright, whom I have already named to you as the person who had fixed the price of this cadetship, in a manner renewing and opening the contract that had been so abandoned, and he receives an answer to that letter upon the 27th of February 1827: " Mr. Wright presents his compliments to Col. Edwards," that was the name under which the negociation was carried on on the part of Dr. Back; " and begs to say, that the opportunity now exists for opening the treaty alluded to in his note; but that he is going out of town to-morrow for a week or ten days, and will commission a friend of his to attend to any communication or appointment that Col. Edwards may think proper to make for that purpose, being perfectly conversant in those matters. Mr. W. begs to say, that he only came to town on Sunday, which is the cause of Col. Edwards not having had an earlier reply, and shall feel obliged by his addressing him in future to No. 63, Upper Norton-street, having outted his house in Alsop's Buildings. Mr. W. will feel obliged by an early reply, as the opportunity may not last long. And he dates this from 63, Upper Nortonstreet, so that the effect of this letter is to identity himself with the person afterwards found in 63, Norton-street; in effect, handing over Dr. Back from any farther communication with himself at this moment to this person, whoever he might turn ont to be, who would be found upon the premises in Norton-street. Accordingly, a short time after Dr. Back came to town, I think upon the 5th of March after, he sent a note to the direction of Norton-street, No. 63, having addressed it to Mr. Wright, who, he supposes, would either be there in person, or to whom it might be forwarded. He receives no answer to it, nor any letter from Mr. Wright, but from a Mr. Gibbons, one of the other defendants upon this record; the letter he receives is this: " Mr. Gibbons, on the part of Mr. Wright, will meet Col. Edwards to-morrow at one o'clock, at 32, Walbrook, having an appointment there at that hour; and as Col. E. has desired his letter 3 Z letter to be addressed to the City, it probably may be more convenient to him than Norton-street." So that here is a direct appointment formed between Mr. Gibbons, the representative of Mr. Wright, and Col. Edwards, that is Dr. Back, who was come up to town for the purpose I have already mentioned to you.

On that day, the 5th of March, or the next day the 6th of March, a meeting takes place, Dr. Back goes into the City, to No. 32, Walbrook, which is the chambers of a respectable attorney, I believe, who has nothing to do whatever with this transaction-he there meets Gibbons, that person with whom, till that moment, he was an entire stranger. Upon meeting Mr. Gibbons at that place, the conversation immediately assumes the form of a more direct treaty, for Gibbons, upon that occasion, points out the necessity of having the money brought forward directly; that he again specifies the difference in the price of a cavalry and infantry cadetship, and he states that the mode in which these matters are managed by dividing a bank-note in two parts, by leaving one-half with himself or some banker, and the party so advancing to keep the other half, which finds its way to the first half when the matter is completed. That is the statement that Gibbons makes Dr. Back. Accordingly, Dr. Back being in com-munication with the East-India Company, for the purpose of following up the line which has been so pointed out by Gibbons, does, at a subsequent day, procure from them a note for £500, for the purpose of being deposited in the mode But before they se-I have stated. parated on the 6th March, Gibbons produces to Dr. Back, and puts into his hands a printed form, which, I believe, is called a cadet's form of certificate and interrogatories, in order that Dr. Back may procure it, to be properly filled up in order that the intended cadet may obtain the situation. I shall have occasion to make several comments upon this as I go on. I shall only now state, that on this day when the sum was fixed upon, this form of certificate was put into his hands by Gibbons.

Gentlemen, I think upon the 12th of that month the money was actually advanced-this printed paper having been put into the hands of Dr. Back, and as one part of this requires that there should be a certificate of the baptism of the intended candidate for the office, which requires some time to fill up, if he has been baptized in the country, or in some remote part of the kingdom, a considerable interval took place. Dr. Back went down to Little Hampton, and this paper I have in my hand was sent down to Exeter, to procure the proper entry of the baptism, and the certificate of the baptism of young Mr. Back, the son of Dr. Back; it was afterwards sent up to Little Hampton, and was sent by Dr. Back to Gibbons, covered with a letter addressed to Gibbons. I do not know that I need trouble you with such minute details, but it is acknowledged afterwards by a letter from Gibbons, and nothing further that is material takes place till the beginning of April. Gentlemen, about the 10th of April, Gibbons writes a note to Colonel Ed. wards, "Sir, I wrote to you yesterday, to which I beg leave to refer, and according to what I then wrote, that you would hear from me again, this day I have to request you, or the young gentleman. will meet me at 32, Walbrook, on Thursday next, at half-past eleven o'clock, and be prepared to carry the cavalry appoint-ment into effect." The meaning of The meaning of carrying the cavalry appointment into effect was, producing on the part of Dr. Back the stipulated sum of £500, which was first to be laid down before the remainder was advanced. On the 12th of April, Dr. Back comes and having obtained a bank-note of the value of £500 from one of the officers of the Company for this purpose-it was cut in half; one is delivered to Gibbons to be kept by him until the appointment is completed, and the other is kept by Dr. Back, and upon that occasion Gibbons gives a regular receipt—that he has "Received 12th April, 1827, of Dr. Back, the half of a £500 Bank of England note, which I engage to return in case the appointment agreed upon does not take place.'

Now, so the matter stands, I think, up to that day; on that day a new person is introduced upon the stage, for upon that day a person of the name of Tyndale, (Joseph Tyndale), one other of the defendants, is introduced by Gibbons to Dr. Back. To the very great surprise of Dr. Back, he found that Tyndale, although only two days had passed since the deposit of the half of the £500 note, that by some means or other that £500 note has got shifted into the hands of Tyndale, or at least that Tyndale produces an engagement that he has it in his hands, that he only retains the £500 until he has performed his engagement with Gibbons,-thus getting one link further on, as if he was the party to receive the money, he was to procure some other person, this Tyndale, for instance, upon the present occasion, who was to receive the money if he procured the appointment, or a part of it, or what agreement was made between them we know not, and it was immaterial to inquire; but the agreement entered into with Gibbons was by some means or other transferred to Joseph Tyndale. This man, Tyndale, seems to express some degree of disanpointment that the whole matter has not been concluded, and promised very largely that a very little time should elapse till it is: at the same time, as he naturally supposed that Dr. Back would begin to be a little impatient as his money had been lodged, he endeavoured to put him off for some time upon the impracticability of its being then immediately concluded on account of the existing state of things: stating, that the ministry being unsettled. there was a great difficulty in getting this cadetcy appointment. What part of the ministry he alluded to I know not, but I believe that was as true as many other statements I shall have to refer to. need not remind you, that that was exactly the time that there was a change effecting in the administration of the country.

So, gentlemen, the matter rests, considerably to the apparent disappointment of Dr. Back, who was urging the completion of this matter till the 25th, and then it is stated that the matter will very soon be brought to a close, and another person is introduced—Capt. Despard, another of the defendants-he comes in, and states his great surprise that a matter of this sort has been allowed to be under the conduct of Mr. Gibbons and Mr. Tyndale -he does not wonder that this disappointment has taken place, but, he says, I will put you into a way to get it completed directly. I will introduce you to a partner of a great East-India House, Mr. Anstice, who is one of the defendants. But before Capt. Despard makes his appearance, which I think was in the afternoon of the day, there has been an application made to Dr. Back to furnish the remaining part of the money, which was to be the payment for a cadetship. You recollect only £500 have been already advanced; it is stated that not a single step can be taken further in the progress of this matter, unless there is another note of £300, treated in the same way, and cut in two, and deposited, one half with Mr. Gibbons, and the other kept: that is done on the 25th of April; so that now you perceive that all the money that was to be forthcoming on the part of the purchaser has been parted with by him, and put into the hands of Mr. Gibbons, who appears to be the stakeholder. I have told you that Capt. Despard affected a high tone; he speaks with the same disrespect of Mr. Tyndale, that Mr. Tyndale had expressed towards Mr. Gibbons, and that now the money had been advanced, there could be no excuse for not carrying it into effect: I will take you to a person, and the matter shall be managed immediately, and he accordingly takes him to Great St. Helen's, where Capr. Anstice has a counting-house; and when he gets there, he finds Capt. Anstice stating to him, that he has had in his custody for some time the half of that £500 note, and when the other is applied to it, there will be no difficulty in carrying the arrangement into effect, so that this money forms the connecting link between three of the persons I have mentioned to you—between Mr. Gibbons, Mr. Tyndale, and Capt. Anstice—and that Capt. Despard is the person who cements and links together all three, being the medium of introduction of the one to the other. During this time Capt. Despard is as full of his promises as the preceding persons; he states a little difficulty has arisen in consequence of the director he named not being in town, that that director, or another he named. are the persons from whom it is to be obtained. I do not mention the names at present; if their names should appear they are in court, and they are ready upon their oaths to deny having any share in its participation-in short, it is only the means by which these inferior persons,-who are gulling the public in endervouring to A impose upon their betters in society, and obtaining an introduction to directors,-it is only the mode by which they carry their base intentions into execution.

We then come down, gentlemen, to the 25th April, and that is the most important part of the case, because upon the next day it is that for the first time Capt. Prescott will be brought forward to your notice. Gentlemen, I will now trace out,-because it will be more convenient to make the matter clear to you. -after observing that upon the 25th of April the name of Capt. Prescott is brought forward, I will go on and trace the remainder of the parties up to the time when the detection takes place; but I will refer back to this 25th of April, to shew how far the evidence will implicate Capt. Prescott in a guilty knowledge, or means of knowledge, of this transaction. ..

Gentlemen: upon the 27th of April, Dr. Back attends again according to appointment at Capt. Anstice's office, which is at St. Helen's; he is informed that nothing as yet is accomplished; he begins to be extremely anxious, perhaps not so anxious as if the money was his own; he would probably then have urged with a greater degree of vigour the completion of the contract, but he shewed sufficient to induce them to promise to put into exercise all their powers to get it completed. He calls there two or three times in the course of the day, and nothing takes place. At last Capt. Despard, who is still appearing upon the stage at Capt. Anstice's and is the conductor of Dr. Back, Capt. Despard states he had sent to Regent Street to have some intercourse with the gentleman who was to procure the appointment: this is very much to the surprise of Dr. Back, who had never before heard of any person in Regent Street; he asked, why do you introduce a new person to us; I thought you told us that A, B, or C, at the head of affairs, was the person to whom you looked: why do you now say a stranger is the person from whom you are to obtain it? He could get no answer to the question, but on the following day Capt. Despard called again and said all was finished. said that at first, but he corrected himself and said, "all will be completed immediately: there is no doubt that all will be immediately right." Still nothing came. The morning of Saturday, the 28th of April, was wasting away, Dr. Back calling from time to time; put off for half an hour, and then calling again; nothing comes forward in the course of that morning; until at last Capt. Anstice, being tired out, says "we will go together to a gentleman at Waterloo Place, Regent Street, and we will see what is to happen there." Accordingly Dr. Back, accompanied by Capt. Anstice, goes to the office of a gentleman of the name of Andrews, in Regent Street, who is another of the defendants upon the record. He does not see him when he gets there: Mr. Andrews is absent, but had left word he should be there at a certain time; although they wait long beyond that time, Mr. Andrews does not make his appear-Then it is agreed that the very next morning Dr. Back shall call upon Capt. Anstice at his private house, and they shall go together to Mr. Andrews at his private house, and see what was going on as to this appointment-that will be on Sunday; and accordingly on Sunday, the 29th of April, Dr. Back and Capt. Anstice called upon Mr. Andrews and saw Mr. Andrews, and a conversation The precise purport of the takes place. conversation will be explained to you by the witness when he comes. The effect of it was, that every thing would be completed on the following day. At the same time a great caution is given to him not to say any thing upon the subject to any body; that it is extremely important that no one should know what was going on, and that it was no fault of his that it was not completed, for his client was in great want of money at that time, and it would be of great importance to him to receive it. So that now I have introduced another defendant to you, Mr. Andrews. Gentlemen, Monday was the 30th of April, and that Monday the 30th of April had been fixed by Mr. Andrews and Capt. Anstice for the purpose of fully completing the transaction. Still there is some delay, and some fresh excuse why the appointment does not come forward. You will hear the reason why, when I come to state to you what was going on with respect to the appointment at the East. India House, between the nominating and recommending directors.

On this day, the 30th of April, another of the parties, we had long since forgotten in the transaction, steps forward again. Mr. Gibbons sends a note on this day, " Sir. I am quite in the dark," this is to Dr. Back, "as to what is going on. I went to Mr. Anstice's at three o'clock, being told you were to be there at that time, but did not meet you, and after waiting half an hour was told you had been and gone. I was desirous of knowing what was likely to be done, as I am keeping an infantry appointment open. and the party complains of my not giving an answer. I shall expect to see you in the morning, and will call here about cleven." A pretty good intimation of the necessity of making these inquiries, when Mr. Gibbons talks so quietly that he is keeping an infantry appointment open. and he desires to know what is to become of it, as the owner was impatient. I think it was high time for the Company, when they discovered any thing of this sort, to probe it to the bottom, and see who were the guilty parties. However, I only introduce this to show that on this day Gibbons steps forward again, who supposes that this has got into some other train, and that he shall not receive the money he expects. It is only one proof, among others, that the parties cannot trust each other, and that they are introducing link after link in order that you may not be able to trace it out.

That brings us to the next day, Tuesday the 1st of May, when a letter arrives from Capt. Anstice addressed to Col. Edwards (a nom de querre, while he was conducting this business), stating that he must either come by himself, or send his son by hunself, to Mr. Andrews's office in Regent Street. Matters are now arriving very closely to their ultimate termination, for on the very following day, Wednesday the 2d, the whole of the scheme takes effect, and the evidence we bring forward will be complete. Accordingly, the following day the son goes early by himself to Mr. Andrews's house, and there he discovered a stranger he had never seen before, but who turned out to be Mr. Sutton, one other of the defendants upon the record.

What does young Mr. Back go there for? He goes for the purpose of filling up one part of this printed form which it was necessary he should fill up himself, and which had been left unfilled up till that moment it is put into his hands, in the office of Mr. Andrews, by Sutton, with a pencil-mark upon it denoting the manner in which it is to be filled up; in fact, containing the name of the director who had recommended him to the preferment; so that there you have a new person in that stage introduced you see at the last moment—Sutton; but at the most important stage, because it is just preecding that time when the £300 and £500 notes are to be made complete, and when they would be efficient in the hands of the bearer.

